This bill provides for nothing more or less than that you can take up an inebriate in the District of Columbia and that you can confine him in what you call a hospital, and I care not what name you have prefixed to it; it may be the Providence Hospital. It is made to conform to a sentiment that is neither honest nor manly. Why, sir, pass such a bill as that, and then take the Constitution of the United States and throw it out of the Senate and say there is no longer a right of trial by jury for any man. I say this bill is hypocrisy from beginning to end and if passed is the greatest innovation that has yet been made upon the right of trial by jury and I should despise myself as a lawyer if I should vote for it, or as a citizen if I should enforce it, or as an American if I should in any way sanction it.

Mr. HOAR. Does it not provide for trial by jury?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir, it does not provide for trial by jury; it provides for taking up the unfortunate on the street and gives to the judge a right to summon a jury, but the Constitution says there shall be a jury selected in a certain form, that they shall be chosen in a certain way, and the bill is an innovation upon that. It is a bill that is contrived by what is called now the local-option sentiment of this country; and while I can be a local optionist if I want to be, I yet refuse to let the local-option sentiment destroy the right of trial by jury given by the Constitution to every man charged with an offense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to inform the Senator from Virginia that his five minutes are out.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is this bill under the five-minute rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I object to its consideration to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over.

JOHN P. WALWORTH.

The bill (S. 2122) for the relief of John P. Walworth was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to John P. Walworth $2,820, being the proceeds of the sale of certain funds, to wit, $4,700 in bank-notes of the issue of the Louisiana Bank of New Orleans, and which were in the month of August, 1863, on deposit in that bank to the credit of Walworth, and received from the bank by Col. S. B. Holabird, chief quartermaster at the post of New Orleans, by order of Major-General Banks, and sold, and the proceeds thereof, to wit, $2,820, afterward covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. Is there a report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it be read.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I will state for the information of the Senator from Illinois, if he will allow me, that this bill is for the relief of John P. Walworth, a citizen of Chicot County, Arkansas, whose loyalty is beyond any sort of question. He had on deposit in one of the banks in New Orleans $4,700, and under General Order No. 202, issued by General Banks in 1863, the bank was required to turn this money over to the quartermaster.

Mr. LOGAN. That is enough. It was not the bank's funds?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. No, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. All right. I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. REMINGTON & SONS.

The bill (S. 2533) for the relief of E. Remington & Sons was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the claims of E. Remington & Sons for drawback on arms exported by them in 1879 and 1880 without the filing of drawback entries thereof at the time of shipment.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there is any report there let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the following report, submitted by Mr. MILLER June 1, 1886:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of E. Remington & Sons, having examined the same, submit the following report:

A bill (S. 1722) was reported favorably from the Senate Committee on Claims (Report No. 858, Forty-seventh Congress, first session). For the reasons set forth in that report, which is embodied herein, the committee recommend favorable action by the Senate.

[Senate Report No. 858, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

That E. Remington & Sons, of New York, as manufacturers of fire-arms, chiefly for export, prior to 1879, imported certain material for use and which was used in the manufacture of fire-arms. On this material they paid the proper customs duties. The fire-arms manufactured from this imported material were by them exported in 1879 and 1880, when they claimed the drawback duty allowed in such cases. The claim was rejected, for the reason that at the time of the exportation it was the rule of the Treasury Department that no drawback could be allowed under section 3019 of the Revised Statutes unless the materials entering into the manufacture of the merchandise were imported within three years from the date of exportation of the manufactured article. Remington & Sons, in consequence of this rule, filed no drawback entries. It was useless to do so. This ruling of the Treasury Department has since been declared illegal and void by the law officers of the Government, but the Department has not felt authorized to waive its general regulations limiting drawback to cases where proper entries had been made, and Remington & Sons therefore apply to Congress for relief.

The following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to Hon. WARNER MILLER, under date of April 4, 1882, gives a correct statement of the case:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 4, 1882.

SIR: I have received the letter of Messrs. E. Remington & Sons, which you referred to this Department, under the date of the 31st ultimo, in regard to their claim for drawback on certain arms exported by them.

The reasons why the claim was not paid in the regular manner were, first, that at the time of the exportation it was the rule of this Department that no drawback could be allowed under section 3019 of the Revised Statutes unless the materials entering into the manufacture of the merchandise were imported within three years from the date of exportation of the manufactured article, and second, that no drawback entries were filed in these particular cases, the parties alleging, and it is undoubtedly true, that the reason the drawback entries were not filed was that it seemed useless to file such entries in view of the rule, the materials having been imported more than three years. The rule was, however, subsequently revoked by an opinion of the Attorney-General; still, in the absence of the drawback entries, the Department did not feel authorized to waive its general regulations limiting drawback to cases where proper entries had been made.

I am informed that since the passage of the drawback law of 1861 it has been the unvarying rule of this Department to refuse allowance of drawback where entries for exportation were not filed, regardless of the reasons which led to the failure to file such entries. In the case of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, of the city of New York, a claim for drawback was rejected for the reason that drawback entries were not filed, the clerk of the company who was intrusted with the fees and the duty of making entries having stolen the fees and failed to perform his duty. A bill, No. 1982, was introduced in the third session of the Forty-sixth Congress for their relief, and it is understood is now before the Committee on Claims in the United States Senate.

It is suggested that the claim of Messrs. E. Remington & Sons, which is an equitable one, be incorporated in the bill for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company. Messrs. Remington & Sons have been requested to furnish full details of the claims either to you or to this Department.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. J. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. WARNER MILLER,
United States Senate.

As shown by certificate of the collector of customs at New York, the drawback duty on the twenty-two export shipments made by Remington & Sons amounts to the sum of $5,672.15, which amount, less 10 per cent., as provided by section 3019 of the United States Revised Statutes, should, in the opinion of your committee, be returned to E. Remington & Sons, who it appears failed and neglected to file the proper drawback entries in consequence of the foregoing erroneous ruling of the Department, which covered the case of the imported material used by them. In the opinion of your committee Messrs. E. Remington & Sons are entitled to the same relief which at the present session of Congress they have recommended in the case of the "Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company." (See Report 177.)

The committee recommend the following amendments: Strike out the words "six thousand," in line 11 of the bill, and insert "five thousand six hundred and seventy-two fifteen one-hundredths;" and add at the end of line 12 the following, "less 10 per cent. thereof, as provided by section 3019 of the Revised Statutes;" and as thus amended they recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would appeal to the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his call for the reading of the report, as no one is listening to it. It is only occupying time without benefit.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not very long, and I might differ with the Senator as to whether it was of any use to read it or not.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Because no one was listening.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator may not have been listening to it, but I certainly think others were.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The gentleman who called for it was not.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Goodwin as principal and David S. Biggs and Joseph Biggs as sureties, conditioned as required by law for the performance by Goodwin of the duties of assistant quartermaster of the United States Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the land so reserved for a public park shall be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall provide for the survey of said park and marking the boundaries thereof; and he shall have power to provide for the preservation of the timber and for the protection of the natural curiosities contained in said park; and for that purpose he may appoint a superintendent to take charge of and exercise authority over said park, and who shall receive such annual compensation for such services as the Secretary of the Interior may determine; and such service may be terminated at any time the Secretary may direct.

Mr. HARRIS. I appeal to the Senator from Illinois, as this is perhaps the last day that we shall have during this session upon the Calendar under the present rule, that we devote the whole of this evening to acting upon the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. There is such a thing as working men to death. We are not tiring ourselves very much, but there are some officers of the Senate who have done a pretty hard day's work.

Mr. DAWES. There is a long amendment reported, which I think it is not necessary to read, because I propose a substitute for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes a substitute for the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAWES. The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert, instead of the amendment reported by the committee, a shorter one that has been agreed on.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to extend the time of the payments of the purchase-money under the sales made under the two acts, one entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the remainder of the reservation of the confederate Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1881, the other entitled "An act to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation of the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes," approved August 7, 1882, as follows: The time of each payment shall be extended two years beyond the time now fixed by law: Provided, That the interest now due on said payments shall be paid annually at the time said payments are now due: Provided also, That all persons who have settled or shall settle upon said Omaha lands and who have filed their declaratory statement, or who may make bona fide settlement, improvement, and filing prior to the date of the passage of this act and subsequent to the date authorized by proclamation of the President in pursuance of the act aforesaid for such settlement, filing, and improvement in all other respects, except as to time, in conformity with said act, may make the first payment as therein required two years from the date of the passage of this act, and the second payment one year thereafter, and the third payment two years thereafter, but the interest required thereon by law shall be paid annually on the date of the passage of this act: Provided, That all other provisions in the acts above mentioned, except as changed and modified by this act, shall remain in full force.

So that the bill will read:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of clause 38 of section 21 of the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia entitled "An act imposing a license on trades, business, and professions practiced or carried on in the District of Columbia," approved August 23, 1871, requiring real-estate agents to pay $25 annually, and in addition a monthly tax of one-fourth per cent. on gross receipts, as amended by the act amendatory thereof, approved June 20, 1872, as requires real-estate agents in said District to pay a tax of 1 per cent. on their commissions in lieu of said monthly tax of one-fourth per cent. on gross receipts, and so much of section 15 of said act approved August 23, 1871, as requires said real-estate agents to give bond to said District, and all other laws and acts, or parts thereof, inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and from and after the passage of this act real-estate agents in the District of Columbia shall pay a license-fee of $50 per annum, to be collected as other licenses are collected in said District.

SEAL ROCKS IN SAN FRANCISCO HARBOR.

The bill (S. 2428) to grant certain Seal Rocks to the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, in trust for the people of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, line 7, after the word "granted," to insert "subject to the provisions named;" so as to read:

That all the right and title of the United States in and to the rocky islets known as the Seal Rocks, and all rights to seals resorting there, situated off Point Lobos, in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, are hereby granted, subject to the provisions named, in trust to said city and county, upon the following conditions and for the following uses, to wit: Said city and county shall hold said Seal Rocks inalienable for all time, in trust for the people of the United States, and shall commit to the commissioners of Golden Gate Park the custody and care of said Seal Rocks, and shall keep said rocks free from encroachment by man, and shall preserve from molestation the seals and other animals now accustomed to resort there, to the end that said Seal Rocks will continue to be a public preserve and resort for seals.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "seals," at the end of line 16, to insert:

Provided, That the United States may at all times control and limit or diminish the number of the seals resorting to said rocks so as to protect the fisheries and fishing industries: And provided further, That whenever any of said rocks, or the space occupied by said rocks, shall be required by the United States for the erection or maintenance of any public work, or for any other purpose, then as to the rocks or space so required the provisions of this act shall terminate, and the United States shall be reinvested with the full title, control, and possession thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. How are the United States to limit the seals or diminish them, I should like to inquire, except by killing them? Is that the idea?

Mr. BERRY. I did not hear the question of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a provision for limiting the number of the seals that make these rocks a resort. I ask what is the intention of the committee? How are they to be limited unless they are destroyed?

Mr. BERRY. We simply reserve the power to the Government to limit them if it shall be deemed important hereafter. That is a reservation to the General Government, so that the city of San Francisco shall not destroy them; but the Government reserves the right and power to destroy them hereafter if it should be deemed necessary.

Mr. LOGAN. It is all right. I only wanted to know how they would be regulated.

Mr. BERRY. The bill was introduced by the senior Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD], who is not present.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over.

Mr. FRYE. Why should it go over?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator who reported it is not here.

Mr. FRYE. He simply moved an amendment, which was rendered necessary by the action of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRISON. Relating to post-offices?

Mr. FRYE. Yes. I do not think there will be any objection to the bill as amended. It passed the Senate as reported originally.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with amendments, in line 6, before the word "than," to strike out "length," and after the word "than" to strike out "is prescribed by section 4004 of the Revised Statutes" and insert "40 feet in length;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow compensation to such railroad companies as had furnished apartments in cars for use as railway post-offices of less than 40 feet in length, in cases where such apartments had been furnished in pursuance of an agreement or understanding with the Postmaster-General, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, or the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service that special compensation should be allowed therefor; such allowances to be proportioned to the length of the apartments furnished, and not exceeding a pro rata of the price allowed for a 40-foot car, and for the time unpaid for up to the date when the company was notified by the Department that such payment could not be made because not warranted by the present law.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

Mr. MILLER. Can not the report be read?

Mr. COCKRELL. We shall have to discuss it. There are a great many bonds lost that we are called on to pay for. I had a case examined once and I examined the whole record in regard to the claims for lost bonds, and there are some very remarkable cases where the loss of bonds had been proved most conclusively and the bonds have since turned up, so that we must be guarded in the matter. There are a great many bonds in that condition.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then debate is out of order.

Mr. MILLER. There is a report in this case and a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Walker, a soldier of the Revolutionary war, arrears of pension from the 4th of March, 1860, to March 9, 1878, at the rate of $8 per month.

Mr. INGALLS. Does that allow arrears of pension? Let it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us hear the report in that case read.

Mr. BLAIR. Perhaps I can state it so as to satisfy the Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the report be read.

Mr. BLAIR. This is a Revolutionary soldier's widow, the only one living in the country, down in Texas.

Mr. INGALLS. This gives arrears for eighteen years.

Mr. BLAIR. She lives down in Texas. Her pension was cut off when the rebellion broke out, and we did not pay her from 1860 to 1878. It is simply to give that widow of a Revolutionary soldier, she being over ninety years of age, her pension during that time.

Mr. COKE. I know the old lady; she lives in my town.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Texas knows her, it is evident the bill ought to pass; but I want to hear the report.

Mr. COKE. She is the widow of a Revolutionary soldier, ninety years old.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BLAIR June 8, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6311) granting arrears of pension to Mrs. Maria Walker, have examined the same, and report:

Your committee append hereto the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives (House Report No. 1943), which contains a full statement of the facts, and recommend the passage of the bill:

Mrs. Maria Walker is the widow of John H. Walker, who was a private soldier in Captain Henry's company, Colonel Alexander's regiment, Georgia militia, in the war for American independence. Mrs. Walker became his wife on March 14, 1815. Her husband died in 1836, and she has never remarried. Under the act of February 3, 1853, which provided for the pensioning of the widows of Revolutionary soldiers who were married after the year 1800, she was placed on the pension-roll from the date of that act, and continued to draw a pension up to March 4, 1860, at which time she was dropped from the rolls. She was restored to the rolls under the act of March 9, 1878, at the rate of $8 per month.

Mrs. Walker has made several applications to the Pension Office to be allowed payment of her pension for the time during which she was suspended from the rolls, but is and has been unable to comply with the requirements of that office as to proof of loyalty to the United States during the period of the late civil war, as, being a native and always a resident of the South, she naturally sympathized with her people, to whom only, at her then advanced age, could she look for counsel and relief.

Mrs. Walker is now over ninety years of age, is in straitened circumstances, and largely dependent upon relatives and friends for a home and support, her only income being the $8 per month she now receives since she was restored to the rolls.

Mrs. Walker is one of the very few, perhaps the only widow of a soldier of the Revolutionary war now living; and in view of the facts it would seem eminently proper for the American Congress to pay to this old lady the small sum which the bill will allow, and thereby place her for the remainder of her days, which must be very short at best, beyond the reach of want.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "sixty," in line 7 of the bill, and insert the words "to March 9, 1878, at the rate of eight dollars per month."

Mr. VAN WYCK. When was she dropped from the roll?

Mr. BLAIR. In 1860, and restored in 1878.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I would suggest that the form of the bill be changed, and that she be restored to the roll from such a date. We can not at this juncture in the history of the legislation on this matter come in now and pass a special bill giving arrears of pension. That is a thing which ought never to be thought of.

Mr. BLAIR. To amend the bill would send it back to the House.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It will be competent to restore her to the pension-roll from that date or to increase her pension. Better by far do the latter than commence now and establish a precedent for paying arrears of pension. If we do, we shall never see the end of the applications. I will go as far as the Senator from Texas desires or as far as the Senator from New Hampshire in my support of a pension to this widow of a Revolutionary soldier to any extent.

Mr. COKE. The only objection to the Senator's suggestion is that there will be doubt about the action of the House.

Mr. VAN WYCK. We shall be here probably a month yet, and if there were only three days left there would be no difficulty in passing it in the House.

Mr. BLAIR. It does not occur to me that it would be an exhibition of very good sense on our part to change the form of the bill as it now is. It relates only to the widow of a Revolutionary soldier. There is no analogy between what is being done here and the ordinary payment of arrears of pensions.

This woman was a pensioner. She was dropped in 1860. She was restored by the action of the Department in 1878, and has been receiving her pension at the same rate ever since. This is a proposition simply to pay her the arrears between those two dates, which the Department has no authority to do, and I can not conceive that the bill can be put in any better form, if as good a form, as it now stands. As I was suggesting, a return of the bill to the House will simply delay it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I will move as an amendment that she be restored to the pension-roll from the date she was dropped, but deducting what she has received.

Mr. COKE. The legal effect of the bill is just that.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Precisely; but I want to do it in a form which has been recognized. I have said that where persons have been improperly dropped and have been restored to the roll it has been the custom to restore them to the roll from the time they were dropped and to allow them to receive pay from the time they were dropped. That is far different from a bill which says on its face that it is for arrears of pension. I will propose an amendment—because I am with the Senator from Texas on the amount of money—that she be restored to the pension-roll from the time she was dropped.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I move to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New Hampshire says, "Vote it down." He proposes to have no amendments adopted here. I object to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I shall move an amendment in the morning.

Mr. BLAIR. I opposed action on the amendment. I think I had a right to do so without subjecting myself to the comments of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and request a conference with the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUSAN A. WAMACK.

The bill (H. R. 3998) for the relief of Susan A. Wamack, administratrix of the estate of Stephen M. Farish, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Susan A. Wamack, of Morgan County, Kentucky, administratrix of the estate of Stephen M. Farish, deceased, $159.29, for services as mail contractor in Kentucky from April 1, 1861, to October 7, 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. J. PHILLIPS.

The bill (H. R. 5553) for the relief of E. J. Phillips was announced as the next bill in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought we passed a general law which authorized the adjustment by the Post-Office Department of all such claims; and if this claim comes within the terms of that law, I must object.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think that the law which was passed related to cases of burglary, but to losses by fire; did it not?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; it related to any kind of a loss where the postmaster was not in fault.

Mr. HARRISON. The amount of loss to be covered by the law I think was limited to $300.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; it may have been limited to $2,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerks inform the Chair that it was limited to $2,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is my recollection, and I do not think I am mistaken, for I have looked at it very often.

Mr. SAWYER. This bill is not on account of the postal funds, but money-orders and stamps. The payment is recommended by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. All cases of loss of stamps are covered by the law.

Mr. SAWYER. But this is a larger amount than is covered by the law, I think the Senator will find by examining the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am certain the law authorizes the payment; but I could not find that the report referred to that question at all.

Mr. SAWYER. What is the amount in the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be passed over until we can examine into it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

THOMAS SAMPSON.

The bill (H. R. 4139) for the relief of Thomas Sampson was announced as next in order.

Mr. GORMAN. Let that bill go over. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] I know desires to be present when it is considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think there is no objection to the bill. It was reported by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to be present when it is considered.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I was not aware of that.

PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

The bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, the laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CULLOM. That bill has been before the Senate and is now pending as the unfinished business.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Yes, it is the unfinished business at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM R. WHEATON AND CHARLES H. CHAMBERLAIN.

The bill (S. 988) for the relief of William R. Wheaton and Charles H. Chamberlain, of California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in lines 7 and 8, to strike out "$5,330.76, being" and insert "$3,800, being a portion of;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to William R. Wheaton, register, and to Charles H. Chamberlain, ex-receiver of the land office at San Francisco, Cal., jointly, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,800, being a portion of the amount deposited in the Treasury of the United States by them as fees for testimony which was taken by clerks whose compensation was paid from the private funds of said register and said ex-receiver.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORIDA TELEGRAPH LINE AND SIGNAL STATION.

The bill (S. 2652) for the construction of a military telegraph line from Sanford, Fla., to Point Jupiter, Florida, and the establishment of a signal station, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $17,000 for the construction of a military telegraph line on the eastern coast of the State of Florida from a point at or near Point Jupiter, Florida, to Sanford, Fla., and for the establishment of a station for the taking of meteorological observations and the display of storm-signals at Point Jupiter; the line and station to be constructed, maintained, and operated under the direction and control of the Secretary of War, in connection with the establishment of signal and display stations for the observation and report of storms for the benefit of commerce and agriculture.

Mr. CALL. In line 7, after the word "Florida," where it occurs the second time, I move to insert the words "or to the nearest point of railroad connection;" so as to read:

At or near Point Jupiter, Florida, to Sanford, Fla., or to the nearest point of railroad connection.

Mr. LOGAN. How did that bill come to be reported from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It proposes to establish a signal station.

Mr. CALL. There will be no objection to this amendment. It is simply designed to shorten the line.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that; but the bill ought to have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MCMILLAN. No; it is for the establishment of a signal station.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. MARIA WALKER.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the objection be withdrawn to the bill (H.

R. 6311) granting arrears of pension to Mrs. Maria Walker in order that I may offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to know what is proposed.

Mr. COKE. I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I object to the consideration of the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire objects to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COKE. Does the Senator object?

Mr. BLAIR. I object to the consideration of the bill if it is proposed to amend it.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The bill (S. 1188) to exempt the property of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, D. C., from taxation was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Does not that include all their property on New York avenue?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It includes a lot on New York avenue.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I see that the bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia by the presiding officer of the Senate at this time, and it includes all the property of what is called the Young Men's Christian Association.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will hear the bill read he will understand exactly what it includes.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I think I am right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has not yet been read. The bill will be read if there is no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on the District of Columbia report to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the property known as lot 3, square 222, being house numbered 1409 New York avenue, in Washington city, D. C., occupied by the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, be, and the same is hereby, exempt from all taxation so long as the same is so occupied and used; and the taxes which have accrued and become due on and after July 1, 1884, be, and the same are hereby, released, subject to the provisions of section 8 of the act approved March 3, 1877, providing for exemptions of church and school property from taxation.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER subsequently said: I withdraw my objection to Senate bill 1188, having very great doubts about whether it is entirely correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn. The substitute reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia has been read. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. MARIA WALKER.

Mr. COKE. I again ask that the objection to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6311) granting arrears of pension to Mrs. Maria Walker be withdrawn by the Senator from New Hampshire in order that I may propose an amendment, which I think will be satisfactory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time the bill (H. R. 6311) granting arrears of pension to Mrs. Maria Walker.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Texas will allow the Calendar to be finished and let that bill be passed over. There has been objection made to the bill, and it will lead to discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. COKE. I hope no objection will be made. The bill was passed over informally, and I simply ask the Senate to return to it.

Mr. CULLOM. Have the Senator from Texas and the other Senators who have been discussing it agreed upon an amendment?

Mr. COKE. I think there will be no trouble about it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? If not, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator from Texas will suggest his amendment.

Mr. COKE. I submit an amendment to come in after the word "war," in line 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "war," in line 5, down to and including the word "month," at the end of the bill, and to insert:

The amount of money she would have received at $8 per month had she not been dropped from the roll between the 4th of March, 1860, when she was dropped, and the 9th of March, 1878, when she was restored.

So as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Maria Walker, widow of John H. Walker, a soldier of the Revolutionary war, the amount of money she would have received at $8 per month had she not been dropped from the roll between the 4th of March, 1860, when she was dropped, and the 9th of March, 1878, when she was restored.

Mr. INGALLS. The words "had she not been dropped from the roll" are superfluous and might as well be omitted.

Mr. COKE. I doubt if they are superfluous. Still, I am entirely willing the words should be omitted if the Senator insists upon it. They can do no harm in the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let me suggest to the Senator that we pursue the course we have been in the habit of pursuing in phraseology. We have frequently restored to the rolls persons who had been dropped and given them pay from the date they were dropped. I suggest to the Senator the ordinary phraseology in those cases, "be directed to restore the name," inserting the name, "to the pension-roll from the date when her name was dropped therefrom at the rate of $8 per month"——

Mr. MAXEY. That is in the amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have no objection to the other amendment being embraced in the bill, but I should like to have this inserted. I ask the Chief Clerk to give me the name.

The CHIEF CLERK. "Mrs. Maria Walker."

Mr. COKE. The date is the 4th day of March, 1860.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope we shall go on with the other cases on the Calendar until the Senators agree upon an amendment to the bill.

Mr. COKE. I thought an amendment had been agreed on. I suppose it will be arranged in a moment.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to object to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair put the question subsequently, and there was unanimous consent to its consideration. The bill is, however, subject to objection.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I propose to have the bill read:

Be directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Maria Walker, from March 4, 1860, the date when her name was dropped therefrom——

Mr. LOGAN. If you stop right there you have got it all right.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; because she has received a pension since March, 1878.

Mr. LOGAN. That does not make any difference.

Mr. VAN WYCK. And then I propose to add the words:

Deducting therefrom any money she has received since March 9, 1878.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska offer that amendment?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I offer that amendment.

Mr. COKE. Where does it come in?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. Then, in order to get the matter settled, I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment just moved by the Senator from Texas.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Maria Walker, from March 4, 1860, the date when her name was dropped therefrom, at the rate of $8 per month, deducting therefrom any money she has received since March 9, 1878.

Mr. LOGAN. The phrase "since that time" will cover it.

Mr. CULLOM. Is the bill subject to objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has modified his amendment on the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that under the amendment as it now stands this poor woman would get a pension for eighteen years paid to her and would have deducted from that all she has received in twenty years.

Mr. VAN WYCK. No; she will get her pension from 1860 to 1878, and the amendment merely deducts what she has received from 1878 to the present time.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Nebraska——

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator had better object to it and let it go over until it can be settled.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The form in which the amendment is drawn is perfectly plain, and I trust there will be no objection to it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the bill be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be laid aside informally to be taken up again.

J. N. QUACKENBUSH.

The bill (S. 2661) touching the grade of commander in the Navy and to correct an error in relation to an appointment therein was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. Let that be passed over. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who reported the bill is not here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as section 5:

SEC. 5. That section 1889, title 23, of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add as a new section:

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6311) granting arrears of pension to Mrs. Maria Walker.

Walker, a soldier of the Revolutionary war, from and after March 4, 1860, and pay her a pension therefrom, deducting any sums received since that date.

Mr. BLAIR. At what rate shall the pension be paid?

Mr. VAN WYCK. The legal rate.

Mr. BLAIR. That is quite indefinite.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That can be inserted, but there is only one rate for widows.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not raise any objection or make any suggestion.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 17, 1886.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ACCOUNTS OF THE LATE SECRETARY OF ALASKA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the late secretary of the Territory of Alaska and recommending an appropriation to pay him certain items disallowed in his accounts; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House under the rule a bill of the House (H. R. 1501) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL F. RICE.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar the bill (H. R. 8751) for the relief of Samuel F. Rice and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill indicated by him and that it be taken up for present consideration. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of Samuel F. Rice for a balance due him by the United States for his services as an attorney assisting in the prosecution of forty-two criminal cases in the circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Alabama, forty-one of which were against deputy marshals for alleged violation of section 5438 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the other for alleged perjury, be, and the same is hereby, referred, along with the letter of the Attorney-General of November 25, 1885, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, relating to said claim, and the papers therein referred to, to the Court of Claims, with full jurisdiction in said court to inquire and determine whether said services were worth more than the amount which has been paid on account of them, and, if so, how much more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Committee on the Judiciary recommended an amendment striking out, in lines 17 and 18 of the bill, the words "and that said court report to Congress its determination in the premises" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and the said court shall hear all legal evidence taken by deposition or orally as to the character and value of the services rendered by said Rice, and the contract, if any, under which the same were rendered; and if said court shall find from the evidence that said Rice is entitled to compensation in excess of the $2,500 which he has received, said court shall report its finding and all the evidence in the cause to Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 6395) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, with a recommendation that the amendments of the Senate thereto be non-concurred in, and that a committee of conference be requested on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the managers on the part of the House at some time during the day.

T. J. PITZER.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 952) for the relief of T. J. Pitzer, and that the House now proceed to consider the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to T. J. Pitzer, of Barboursville, Ky., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $400, for mules taken from him and used for the public service during the late civil war.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TAULBEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PASSENGERS ON TOW-VESSELS.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3037) relating to the licensing of vessels engaged in towing to carry persons in addition to their crews be non-concurred in, and that the House request a conference with the Senate on the disagreement.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly; and the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. CRISP, Mr. CLARDY, and Mr. DUNHAM as conferees on the part of the House.

EDWARD G. PENDLETON.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar and pass with the amendments reported by the Committee on Claims the bill (H. R. 7807) to muster Edward G. Pendleton, a captain of cavalry, into the service of the United States, and to pay him for his services from August 31, 1861, to July 10, 1864, inclusive.

The bill and amendments were read.

Mr. BLAND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I trust the gentleman will allow this bill to pass.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

WOOL DUTIES.

Mr. MCKINLEY. In pursuance of leave granted yesterday, I desire now to file the views of the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means on two resolutions, one for the restoration of the wool duties of 1867, and the other for retaining the present rates.

The SPEAKER. The views of the minority which the gentleman from Ohio now presents under leave of the House will be printed with the report of the majority of the committee.

CORRECTION.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the RECORD of May 18. In the vote as published on page 4603, upon the passage of Senate bill No. 1405 in relation to the study of the nature of alcoholic drinks and narcotics in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, I am recorded as not having voted. As a fact I did vote, and upon inquiry of the Journal Clerk I find the Journal so shows. I desire the RECORD to show that I voted in favor of the passage of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave for withdrawal of papers without leaving copies was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. PRICE, in the case of Thomas Cummings.

To Mr. HALSELL, in the case of William Watkins.

REPORT ON FORFEITURE OF NORTHERN PACIFIC LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY], on behalf of the Committee on Public Lands, asks that an order be made for reprinting a report the copies of which, as he states, have been exhausted. The Clerk will read the proposed resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to print for the use of the House of Representatives 1,000 copies of the report of the Public Lands Committee on the forfeiture of the Northern Pacific land grant.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. SPRINGER, Mr. WARNER of Missouri, and Mr. BUCHANAN as conferees on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 1357) authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine certain claims.

REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL POLAR EXPEDITION.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I send to the desk a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, have considered the same; and I am instructed to report it back to the House and recommend its passage. The cost is estimated at $8,877.37:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 4,500 copies, with the necessary illustrations, be printed of the report of the international polar expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, Grinnell Land, by First Lieut. A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, acting signal officer, 1,250 of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,250 for the use of the House of Representatives."

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORFEITING IOWA LAND GRANTS.

Mr. COBB. I ask, by unanimous consent, to call up for consideration the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I hope it will be called up immediately after the morning hour.

SESSION OF UTAH LEGISLATURE.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House to take from the Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9118) to provide for a session of the Utah Legislature.

This bill is in obedience to a message from the President of the United States, and I hope there will be no objection, in view of the exigencies of the case, to its present consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. Permit me to say that there is urgent necessity for this measure to pass now. The charitable institutions of that Territory will be without money to pay expenses after the 30th of this month unless this bill shall pass. It is reported from the Committee on the Territories in obedience to a special recommendation from the President. The institutions for the deaf and dumb and other charitable institutions will be compelled to close for want of funds.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not object. Let me state to him——

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think we had better have a private explanation some other time. There is no immediate urgency that I can see for this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is recommended by the President, who has asked the passage of the bill in a special message; and, as I have said, the charitable institutions will have no money after the 1st of July, the Legislature having adjourned without making an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. There is objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to go to the House Calendar for the purpose of taking up public-land forfeiture bills for present consideration.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, there has been an understanding that to-day a motion would be made to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the tariff bill. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois at what time it is intended to make that motion, in order that the House may be advised of the fact.

Mr. MORRISON. At half past 1 o'clock to-day, with the consent of the House.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. COBB, the House divided; and there were—ayes 129, noes 9.

Mr. STRAIT. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. STRAIT and Mr. COBB were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 185, noes none.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD LANDS.

The first business on the House Calendar from the Committee on the Public Lands was the bill (H. R. 5883) forfeiting certain lands granted to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company (of California) by section 18 of the act of Congress approved January 27, A. D. 1866.

Mr. COBB. I move that this bill be laid aside, and I do this by consent of the gentleman in charge of it, who is not present.

Mr. STRAIT. I object.

Mr. PAYSON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the gentleman having charge of the bill, as I understand Mr. Henley, of California, desires it to be laid aside, may it not be done?

The SPEAKER. It may by consent or by a vote of the House, or the House may refuse to consider it altogether.

Mr. PAYSON. I understand my colleague, the chairman of the committee, has indicated that the gentleman from California is willing to postpone its consideration.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Minnesota objects.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I move that the consideration of the bill be postponed.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I would ask if the general order in relation to the consideration of these land-grant-forfeiture bills does not provide that they shall be taken up and considered in the order in which they appear on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is correct; but the House may refuse to consider any one of them and proceed to another. It is entirely in the control of the House.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PAYSON, it was agreed to.

So the House refused to consider the bill.

ONTONAGON RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The next business on the House Calendar was the bill (H. R. 391) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of a railroad from Ontonagon to the Wisconsin State line, &c.

Mr. PAYSON. I have charge of that bill and move to postpone its present consideration. I object to its consideration now.

The SPEAKER. Will the House proceed to the consideration of the bill?

The question being taken, there were on a division—ayes 23, noes 121.

Mr. GUENTHER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. GUENTHER and Mr. COBB were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 1, noes 162.

So the House refused to consider the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read the title of the next land-grant-forfeiture bill on the House Calendar, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6658) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad from Portland, in Oregon, to the Central Pacific Railroad, in California.

Mr. PAYSON. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now proceed to consider the bill the title of which has just been read?

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 140.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB].

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Would it be proper to ask unanimous consent that some one would announce what we are trying to do, that we may all understand it? I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] may be allowed to make a brief statement.

Mr. PAYSON. If I may have the consent of the House I will make a short statement.

Mr. STRAIT, and Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, objected.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. We are trying to pass over a few bills in order to reach the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad land-grant-forfeiture bill.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will resume the count.

The count was completed; and the tellers reported—ayes 2, noes 161.

So the House refused to consider the bill.

The Clerk commenced to read the title of the next forfeiture bill on the House Calendar, the bill H. R. 6659.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the House take a recess until half past 1 o'clock.

The House divided; and the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for a division.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 154.

So the motion that the House take a recess was not agreed to.

The Clerk again commenced to read the title of the bill H. R. 6659.

Mr. STRAIT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 5, noes 98.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The Clerk read the title of the bill H. R. 6659, as follows:

To declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Central Pacific Railroad, in California, to Portland, in Oregon.

Mr. HENLEY. Pursuant to a programme agreed upon by the Public Lands Committee this morning, I object to the consideration of that bill.

The question being taken on considering the bill, there were—ayes 13, noes 134.

Mr. STRAIT. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. PAYSON, and the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STRAIT.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ay 1, noes 162.

So the House refused to consider the bill.

The Clerk commenced to read the title of the bill H. R. 147, the next forfeiture bill on the House Calendar.

Mr. STRAIT (at 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.). I move that the House take a recess until half past 1 o'clock p. m.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 6, noes 107.

Mr. STRAIT. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STRAIT, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. PAYSON.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ay 1, noes 162.

So the House refused to take a recess.

Mr. STRAIT. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday next.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. STRAIT. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 74.

Mr. STRAIT. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STRAIT, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. PAYSON.

Before the tellers had completed the count,

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, said: May I ask unanimous consent to make a statement which it seems to me may settle this matter?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS] asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. We have no objection, Mr. Speaker, to the portion of the bill which forfeits the land grant to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company; but we have been taken by surprise somewhat by an intimation——

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman from Wisconsin had unanimous consent to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked unanimous consent to make a brief statement, and there was no objection.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. DUNHAM. The objection is too late.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. If the gentleman does not want to make a speech I think there will be no objection to his proceeding.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I do not want to make a speech. I wish merely to submit a proposition, and I understood I had unanimous consent to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his proposition.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. There is a clause in this bill which we have been informed it is proposed to strike out. It has been adopted as a part of the bill in the report of the committee. Consequently we are taken by surprise. I wish to read that clause, and if gentlemen will consent that that clause shall go in the bill as it came from the Senate and as the Committee on Public Lands have reported the bill we have no objection, and are willing it shall be considered at a session of the House next Tuesday evening.

Mr. COBB. We can not agree to that.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. We are ready to meet the effort to amend the bill if we can have ample time to present fully to the House the questions and equities involved.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. We can not allow that four men shall control the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The tellers will resume the count.

TARIFF.

Mr. MORRISON (at half past 1 o'clock p. m.). The hour has arrived at which, by unanimous consent, it was understood I was to be allowed to make another motion.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending, made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STRAIT], that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday next.

Mr. STRAIT. I withdraw that motion in order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] may proceed to call up the tariff bill.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider revenue bills; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRISON. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MCKINLEY. In the confusion the motion of the gentleman from Illinois was not distinctly understood on this side. Is the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the general tariff bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. MORRISON. That is the object of the motion.

Mr. MCKINLEY. We join in requesting the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills raising revenue, and upon that motion the gentleman demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 157, not voting 27; as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill making appropriations for the naval service.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I raise the question of consideration on that bill for the purpose of endeavoring to bring before the House the reports of the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration can not be raised on this motion, but the motion can be rejected by the House if it so determines.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I understand, and that is the reason I make the suggestion.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HERBERT; and there were—ayes 149, noes 19.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. All right. I have discharged my duty in the matter.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 9478) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on that bill.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House, in pursuance of the motion of Mr. HERBERT, resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. HERBERT, by unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to come to some agreement with the gentlemen on the other side and with the House as to the time to be occupied in general discussion of this bill. On this side of the House I think there is very little disposition to discuss it, and I think we would be satisfied with two or three hours—an hour or an hour and a half on each side.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, speaking not for the leaders, but for those who are led, I think we are willing on this side to have no discussion of the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I dissent from the expression of the gentleman from Ohio. Discussion is desired on this side of the House; and it seems to me if they want two hours on the other side, it being now 2 o'clock, they had better let the discusion run on until the time for adjournment and fix the limit later.

Mr. HERBERT. Would not the other side of the House be willing to consent now that general debate be closed to-day at 5 o'clock?

Mr. HISCOCK. No, I do not believe it would.

Mr. STEELE. I think it would. If the gentleman from Alabama will make a proposition of that kind I think we shall agree to it pretty quickly.

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. HERBERT). Make the motion.

Mr. HERBERT. I am not permitted, as I understand, to make a motion to limit general debate until there has been some debate.

Mr. BUCK. I desire to say to the gentleman from Alabama that several gentlemen on this side of the House, including at least two who are not members of the committee, desire to be heard on this question, occupying perhaps altogether three or four hours on this side. I desire, therefore, that debate be allowed to run for a while until we can determine what limitation should be agreed upon.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he proceed now with his opening remarks, and as the debate runs along we can see how much time is desired for general debate.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that while it is perfectly natural that gentlemen who are on the committee should desire to speak and should wish to obtain ample time for that purpose, yet the House has some rights in such a matter. It is now very late in the session, and I hope this debate will not be spun out indefinitely.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rules of the House I would have no right to move to limit the debate until there has been some general discussion. That disposes of the desire of some of our friends here who wish to have an immediate vote on that question; and as my colleagues on the committee desire that the debate shall proceed, I will go on with my explanation of the bill, giving notice that very soon I shall make a motion (in which I hope I shall have the co-operation of the gentlemen on both sides) to limit the debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before the gentleman from Alabama proceeds to explain the bill let us have order.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will resume their seats, and the House will come to order.

Mr. HERBERT Mr. Chairman, if the committee will give me its attention I will endeavor to explain this bill.

The appropriations in it are under several heads. The first is for the pay of the Navy, officers and men. Then there are separate appropriations for the eight different bureaus into which the Navy Department is divided. Then there is a separate appropriation for the naval asylum; another for the Naval Academy; and then comes up the question of an appropriation for the war college. Besides these there is an appropriation for the marines. I shall take up these several items in their order; and we first come to the question of the pay of the Navy.

The committee, when they began to investigate this question, were struck with the fact that there was a large surplus on hand which had been for several years gradually accumulating to the credit of the pay of the Navy. On inquiry it was ascertained that a very considerable portion of this sum was net balance, against which there were no outstanding debts whatever. At the end of the last fiscal year, on the 30th of June, 1885, this surplus amounted to $576,000. These accumulations have resulted from the operation of the annual appropriations for this service as affected by the law of 1874, which makes appropriations for the pay of the Navy continuous. There are five of these funds which do not lapse into the Treasury at the end of two years as other appropriations do, the fund for the pay of the Navy, the fund for the pay of the Marine Corps, the fund for clothing of the Navy, the fund for small stores, and the naval hospital fund.

I have before me a table prepared in the office of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, who deals with these accounts, showing the gradual accumulation of these funds. At the end of the fiscal year 1879, the balance on hand to the credit of pay of the Navy in round numbers was $209,000; in 1880, $1,397,000; in 1881, $1,747,000; in 1882, $1,629,000; in 1883, $2,051,000; in 1884, $2,182,000. These however, were not net balances. There is or was a large outstanding indebtedness against each of these items. But at the end of the fiscal year 1885, there remained in the Treasury, as I have said, to the credit of pay of the Navy, the sum of $576,000.

Now, according to the construction of this act of 1874 and the other laws bearing on the same question, from the days of Secretary Sherman down to the present administration, it has been held that this net balance standing to the credit of the pay of the Navy at the end of each year and against which there was no indebtedness whatever, might be used for the pay of the Navy for any year whatever. This was the decision of the Comptroller under Secretary Sherman, and this ruling was followed by Secretary Folger and Secretary McCulloch. Comptroller Lawrence delivered an elaborate opinion adopting this construction. This ruling had stood, and the practice under it had been uniform for twelve years when this appropriation bill was framed. Therefore, desiring to utilize this net balance of $576,000, we made our appriations less by that much than was supposed to be necessary for the wants of the Navy.

But an opinion has been delivered by Second Comptroller Maynard, answering a call made upon him, in which he differs from the construction heretofore put upon the law of 1874 by his predecessors. This different construction of the law, however, does not alter the fact there is a balance carried over from year to year, almost constantly increasing, a balance of $576,000 at the end of the last fiscal year, a balance which, it is estimated, will amount to $684,000 on the 30th of this month. There is no need for it; we ought to utilize it, and we propose to do so by changing the verbiage of the original bill and reappropriating this sum which stands there subject to the order of Congress. By that much then we reduce, not the expenditure, but the amount taken from the Treasury.

This appropriation pay of the Navy is further affected by a falling off in the amount that will be due for longevity-pay under the law of 1882. That law, which I need not speak of at length, gave longevity-pay to certain officers. The law was, to a certain extent, retroactive, so that the heaviest payments under it would become due in the first few years after its passage. To meet this demand, an appropriation of some $30,000 was made. But that appropriation was totally insufficient. There has been paid on account of that law, out of "pay of the Navy," $286,409.75.

It is estimated by the Fourth Auditor that by reason of the falling off of this demand the amount necessary to pay the Navy will be reduced for the next fiscal year by something like $150,000. It was also in evidence before our committee there would be a surplus remaining from the appropriations for the present year of $90,000. A more accurate estimate furnished from the Treasury is $108,000. That is to say, the estimate is there will be to the credit of pay of the Navy an increase of surplus funds of from $576,000 to $684,000, thus making the difference of $108,000.

In addition to all this the pay of the Navy under the operation of the act of 1882 restricting the number of officers is gradually decreasing, and will continue to do so until we reach the limit fixed by that law.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the following two statements:

†Under the decision of the Supreme Court the names of twenty-seven cadet-engineers, legislated out of the Navy under the interpretation by the Department of act of August 5, 1882, were restored to the Navy list on March 10 last. Six of these have since resigned, and the remaining ones will eventually become assistant engineers.

NOTE.—In August, 1884, the date of estimating for pay of the Navy for 1885–'86, the reduction under the operations of act of August 5, 1882, shows, at that date, the annual amount of pay for the above classes of officers was decreased $66,600—computed at average pay.

The reduction in the pay of officers was down to that time, now nearly two years ago, $142,000. These estimates are the latest which have been made, and this reduction continues and will go on until the limitations of the law are reached all along the line.

We might estimate that a very considerable sum could on this account be taken from the pay for the coming year were it not for the fact that a certain number of cadet engineers have, contrary to the decision of the former Secretary of the Navy, been decided by the Supreme Court to be entitled to commissions. So the pay due these is to be reckoned as offsetting in part at least these reductions I have explained resulting from the operation of the law of 1882, as it affects other officers.

Taking all these things into consideration, the committee have reduced the amount of appropriation of pay of the Navy and pay miscellaneous, which goes with it, by the sum of $206,192. We feel sure we are now very far within the limit, and that there will be a small surplus of this particular appropriation.

And here let me remark that it has been the anxious endeavor of this committee to frame a bill that was perfectly fair. I think my colleagues on the other side of the House who have co-operated with us on this side in examining the estimates and framing this bill will agree that we have intended there should be no deficiency anywhere.

Wherever we have found a deficiency in the bills of past years, if we believed that deficiency was likely to occur in the future upon the same estimates, we have raised the amount and given enough to avoid it; but, on the other hand, we have endeavored to give no more than enough.

We next came to the Bureau of Navigation. The appropriation for this bureau for the fiscal year 1886 amounted altogether to $114,500. The appropriations recommended by the present bill reach an aggregate of $120,500. We have added in some cases and reduced in others, and have made the same appropriations in other respects as in the bill of last year.

For instance, on the ocean surveys $10,000 was appropriated last year. It turns out that only some three or four thousand dollars of that sum has been used, and so we appropriated $4,000 for the present year. But the surveys made under the direction of the Hydrographic Office along the coast of Mexico in the track of the steamers from San Francisco to Panama have not yet been mapped, and an appropriation for charts was wanted. For this purpose we have given $10,000. Twenty thousand dollars was asked, but $10,000 is probably as much as will be utilized during the present year. We have also given something for a compass-testing house, and have reduced the amount of the civil establishment by $1,800.

As to this subject of the civil establishment of the several bureaus in the different navy-yards, the committee have found very great difficulty in dealing with the question, and I think I may say for all of us that the bill is more unsatisfactory to the committee in that regard than in any other.

But when I come to a proper bureau, one which furnishes an illustration of these difficulties, I will endeavor to explain why we were forced to bring in a bill which we are free to say is far from satisfactory to ourselves. I think the reasons which I will assign will carry their lesson with them.

I now come to a matter of importance—not important on account of the amount of money immediately involved but in the consequences to result from our action. In the last Congress some $14,000 was appropriated in the naval bill for a naval war college which has been established by executive order at Newport, and a somewhat similar sum was appropriated in another bill.

There is no appropriation contained in this bill for that college. It has never been established by law, though it has been recognized in the appropriation bills and perhaps by reference to it in other acts of Congress. Now is the proper time to consider carefully the question whether or not that college is to become a permanent institution. In the opinion of a large majority of your committee it ought not. We have now a Naval Academy at Annapolis. We have at Newport the torpedo school and we have there a training school. This war college established there would be the third institution under the Navy Department at Newport. Why should we have so many?

Mr. MCADOO. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HERBERT. Certainly.

Mr. MCADOO. Do you not think it has been the policy of the Department to establish these training schools near the watering places as a general rule, and more for the purpose of benefiting the watering places than the public service?

Mr. HERBERT. That I would not like to say. It seems to me that is not a question for us to consider. Let us decide the other and greater question of establishing or not, permanently, another naval college which will necessarily continue to grow and grow until it becomes a matter of great expense to the Government. We believe, after a full consideration of the question, that there is no necessity for it. The committee are all friends to naval education. We are all friends to the Naval Academy; and we have increased the appropriations for that institution. For the purposes of instruction we estimated we had put $10,000 additional into pay miscellaneous, and in another place we add $5,000 for instruction.

We believe that it is beyond all doubt that the battles of the future are to be decided very largely by scientific knowledge. I believe that we ought to have the very best talent and training in the construction of our ships and in the building of engines. It is from the education of picked young men in these branches we are to expect the best results from the expenditure of money. For one, I am willing to appropriate liberally for a post-graduate course—a course that will develop to the very highest extent the best talent in our land. But I would have that course open to our young men—boys, if you please to call them so—the men we are to rely on to build or devise the ships and engines and implements of war of the future. But what is to be taught in this school for older officers? How to maneuver ships when we have no ships to maneuver? How to manage guns when we have no guns?

It does seem to me that just at this time when our old navy is fast passing away, when it will soon live only in history, now when we need money so much for the building of new ships and new guns, now is not the time for the establishment of another naval college. Build ships and put the officers on them, and then they will learn to maneuver them. Construct guns and put the officers in charge of them, and then they will learn to manage them. If an officer wishes to take a special course of study let him attend a post-graduate course at Annapolis. There we have professors and libraries and apparatus. We had before us Captain Ramsay, the distinguished Superintendent of the Naval Academy, and had his opinion in full on this question, and it was largely upon that opinion and the reasons he gave that we acted when we refused to appropriate for a naval war college.

But why not have the post-graduate course at Annapolis? The necessary building is already there; a good building erected for the purpose to which it was never put—that of a hospital. It would furnish quarters for the officers. We have, as I have said, the plant already there—engines, models, apparatus, library, professors, and all. If necessary we can add to them. This will be easier and cheaper and better than to build a new and rival institution. Mr. Chairman, there are already too many jealousies and rivalries existing among our naval officers. Let every member of this House who is a real friend of the Navy be careful how he votes for the establishment of an institution that will be a new dividing-line, a new source of rivalry and jealousy.

These in brief are the reasons which induced the committee to refuse any appropriation for this war college. It is true it was only a modest amount asked for, some $14,000 in this bill. But another estimate was made for it in another bill in the hands of the Appropriations Committee, the sundry civil bill I believe, amounting to perhaps as much.

We next come to the Bureau of Ordnance. The appropriations there are about what they were for the last fiscal year. It will be noted by any gentleman who has followed me with the Book of Estimates that $146,000 was given in the last bill for purposes for which we only give $127,500. That is for ordnance and ordnance stores. But the difference is only apparent; it is not real. From the $146,000 appropriated for ordnance and ordnance stores for the fiscal year 1886 there was taken and used for the payment of the civil establishment, in addition to the $5,000 expressly appropriated for that purpose, the sum of $23,204. If you subtract that from $146,000 you get about the sum we have given.

Now, we know very well that this country needs a larger appropriation for ordnance than that. It requires more ships and more ordnance; and all that we have provided for in another and separate bill. If we had appropriated in this bill for ordnance and nothing more then it might have been urged by those who are disposed to oppose all expenditures for the increase of our naval establishment, that we had already appropriated for that purpose and that might have been given as a reason for refusing to take up the bill we have reported for new ships. The bill now before the House under the rules can not contain appropriations for new vessels. It can not contain appropriations for any new enterprise. All such must necessarily go upon a separate and distinct bill. So we concluded it would be well to put everything relating to a new navy in one bill.

There are here estimates for improved Hotchkiss and Gatling guns with which to arm our old ships—the ships in our old Navy. Those same estimates were submitted in the last Congress, and substantially nothing was appropriated for them. They are submitted again; but we have appropriated nothing for them except what may be used from the $127,000. Out of similar appropriations hitherto made money has been expended for this purpose, and we now have in our old Navy quite a number of guns of this kind, paid for from this appropriation. We believe this appropriation will be sufficient in addition to the ordinary purposes to arm with rapid-firing guns at least one ship. On the Trenton there are four 37-millimeter revolving guns; on the Tennessee four; on the Lancaster four; on the Omaha four; on the Hartford four; on the Brooklyn four; and on the Pensacola two 57-millimeter guns. These have been purchased out of the appropriations made from year to year, similar to that which we make here.

We have appropriated for torpedoes, and for the work connected with them, $58,500 against $60,000 appropriated heretofore. We have added some little items, which I need not stop to explain, in the other bill which we have reported to the House and which I feel confident we shall be able to take up and pass, in addition to what is appropriated here for torpedoes.

We next come to the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. The business of this bureau, as its name implies, is to provide sails, anchors, chains, ropes, and everything that goes to equip a ship. When we look into this bureau we find some things which are very astonishing, but they are things for which the present distinguished chief of the bureau is in no sense responsible. For instance, we find that there is on hand now in the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting canvas enough to fit out the whole British navy. "Canvas enough to give two suits of sails and a foretop sail to the whole British navy"—that is the expression of Commodore Schley. Altogether, according to the calculation which I have made upon his figures, we have enough to serve our present Navy for thirteen years. He said it would take 7,000 yards with which to give two suits of sails and a foretop sail to the largest ship we have in service.

We have about thirty vessels bearing more or less sail-power. A suit of sails is considered to last three years; so that it would be necessary every year to equip with sails one-third or about ten of our ships. If you average the number of yards for each ship it would make about 5,000 yards for each, or 50,000 a year; and the number of yards we have on hand is 657,903. But the fact is that much of this canvas has come over for ten or twelve years and is nearly worthless.

Then we find extravagance in other things. For instance, there are these spectacle-irons used in rigging sails. We have on hand of these spectacle-irons or clews 75,099 pounds. It is estimated that these are worth $18,744. Upon the estimate of a thousand to a ton and sixty to two suits of sails, we have enough on hand to last us for over fifty years. But making another calculation, estimating according to amounts that have been actually used, as shown by the books since these were bought, and that was a long time ago, in 1871 and 1872—I am making the estimate upon that—we have enough of these to last the Navy for eighteen years.

Now all this comes from what in my opinion is a wrong system the Navy has fallen into. I might designate it as the Toodles system. Toodles bought the coffin because it was a good thing to have in the house. So whenever you appropriate money and give it to a bureau with power to expend it, the money is apt to be expended for things not necessary perhaps at the time but handy to have in the house. We believe it wise to appropriate no more money than is actually needed.

This bureau furnishes also a proper instance from which to explain the difficulties I said we labored under in adjusting the appropriations to the civil establishments in the navy-yards. The House must know, in the first place, that each of these eight different bureaus in the Navy Department has complete jurisdiction over the subject-matter confided to it.

Each is absolutely beyond the control of the other. Each is a little separate Navy Department within itself, and they occupy toward each other and toward the Secretary of the Navy very much the same relation that the several Departments of this Government occupy toward the President. We find this division into different bureaus ramifying everywhere and into everything. Wherever there is a trace of our Navy, there we find the divisions made by these bureaus. We find it on shipboard, we find it in the navy-yards. Go into a navy-yard, and you find there the civil establishment of the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

That bureau has to do with the construction of the hulls of ships, and it has its blacksmith shops, its joiner shops, its paint shops, its storehouses, its clerks, its writers, and all its numerous supervisory force. Then right alongside of that is the Bureau of Equipment and Repair, and it has its blacksmith shops, its joiner shops, its paint shops, its storehouses, and all its supervisory force. You find the same thing when you come to the Bureau of Steam-Engineering or the Bureau of Ordnance. Now, these employés, these blacksmiths and joiners and clerks and writers and storekeepers, all this supervisory force, constitute what is known in the language of the Navy Department the "civil establishment" of the different bureaus, and it has been the custom heretofore to appropriate simply a lump sum, so much for the civil establishment of each bureau.

For the civil establishment of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting there was appropriated for the fiscal year ending in June, 1885, the sum of $9,000. There was actually expended for this civil establishment $20,400. The difference between the sums was taken from the general appropriation.

The last Congress very properly provided that the heads of Departments should send in separate and detailed estimates for all these "civil establishments." It was doubtless the intention of Congress that we should appropriate separately for each employé, so much for this clerk, and so much for that head laborer.

Now, I would like the attention of the House while I endeavor to explain why we did not do that. It was because we found it was impossible for us to determine how many employés were needed by each one of these different bureaus. No one can have any idea of the difficulty of the task of correcting this abuse, too much supervisory force in the navy-yards who have not studied the question, and the efforts that have been made in this direction heretofore. Bureau chiefs are naturally jealous of the power confided to them. They deem it their duty to preserve it, and to do this each feels that his organization must be kept separate and complete. This question is not a new one. It is not presented now for the first time.

In 1882, when Mr. Chandler was Secretary of the Navy, it was presented to him under the operation of a resolution of Congress, an act passed doubtless at his own instance, and he attempted the very reform which we are lamenting to-day that we are unable to carry out fully. Secretary Chandler appointed a board, consisting of Commodore Luce, a line officer; Chief Engineer Loring, a staff officer, and Mr. Mullett, a civilian, to examine into this whole question of the navy-yards and see how many of them ought to be discontinued, and to report generally as to how they could be rendered more efficient and at the same time their administration be made more economical. That board made two reports. When the first report had come in and the Secretary had been furnished with certain memoranda showing the condition of things in the navy-yards Secretary Chandler addressed a circular letter to the chiefs of the different bureaus, which I ask the Clerk to read for the information of the House.

The letter was read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 23, 1883.

SIR: Your attention is called to the "memoranda on the reorganization of the navy-yards, and the disposition proposed to be made of each yard," submitted to the Department by the navy-yard commission in advance of their formal report to Congress.

You will immediately give such orders and make such recommendations to the Department as are necessary to carry into effect, under your bureau, the recommendations of the commission.

The act of August 5, 1882, required the Secretary of the Navy, in certain contingencies, to "suspend work at those yards where he finds it can best be dispensed with," and directed that "at the yards so closed only such officers and employés shall be retained as are necessary to preserve and take care of the property of the Government, and all other persons shall be transferred or discharged."

The sundry civil appropriation act of March 3, 1883, appropriated "for navy-yards and stations, $150,000, and $50,000 additional, which shall be used only in the care and preservation of such yards and stations as may be closed."

The Department understands that this last appropriation of $50,000 will be applicable to the care and preservation of yards and stations where work in the construction and repair of naval vessels may be suspended, in the manner specified in the act of August 5, 1882, although they may continue to be used as naval depots as well as organized to preserve and take care of the property of the Government therein.

In accordance with these views, work is ordered to be suspended as soon as practicable at the Pensacola, League Island, New London, and Boston yards. At Boston, however, work in the rope-walk and the sail-maker's department will continue.

At Portsmouth, repairs of wooden vessels may continue for the present. At Washington, work upon repairs of vessels, or for any purpose not mentioned in the memoranda of the commission, will be discontinued.

You will cause to be made the changes in the organization at each yard recommended by the commission and required by these instruction. You will also carefully consider whether a reduction of foremen beyond that recommended by the commission can judiciously be made in the interest of economy. If so, you will proceed to make such reduction.

You will further examine the "Statistics of navy-yards," in Appendix No. 20 to the report of the Department to the President of November 29, 1882 (page 177), and endeavor to discover additional reductions which may be made in the list of civil employés at each navy-yard, whether in your own or any other bureau, and either make or recommend such reductions.

Your attention is specially called to the large number of persons engaged in clerical duties, either as clerks or writers, and you will endeavor to direct or recommend the discharge of some of these.

The statistics referred to show an enormous daily expenditure on the 16th day of November, 1882, namely: For 657 foremen, clerks, and employés, other than ordinary mechanics and workingmen, $2,179.72, and for 3,805 other employés, $9,139.65, making 4,462 total employés at a daily compensation of $11,319.37, or at the rate of over $3,000,000 a year, when the only work in progress on ships of war at all the yards was repairing the Omaha, Shenandoah, Trenton, Ossipee, Mohican, and Alert. This enormous expenditure for such feeble results is inconsistent with faithful administration, and the Department stands pledged that all unnecessary work shall be discontinued and all employés not needed dismissed. It will be impossible that this pledge shall be carried out unless with the cordial and vigorous co-operation and action of the heads of the bureaus. You are confidently relied upon to do your part in this work of economy.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Chief Constructor T. D. WILSON,
Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repair.

But that vigorous letter and every effort of Secretary Chandler was unavailing. The chiefs of bureaus protested. They failed and refused to give him that co-operation without which reform was impossible. I find no fault with these chiefs. They can not co-operate in breaking up their organizations without surrendering their power—the power which under the present system the law seems to confide to them. The fault is in the system, and this effort of Secretary Chandler and his failure seem to demonstrate it. The board I have spoken of came to that conclusion, and expressed it very pointedly. It will be noted that the letter of Secretary Chandler I had read was dated June 23, 1883. I have stated that his effort failed. After that, October 11, 1883, that board, with the present chief of the Bureau of Steam-Engineering then a member of it, made a report, from which I make the following extract:

To a proper understanding of the subject, it should be stated that the present wasteful extravagance in employing so great an excess of non-producers, and the inefficient system of doing business which has for years past been steadily increasing in our navy-yards, is but the natural outgrowth of the constitution of the Navy Department itself. There can be no manner of doubt of this. Each navy-yard is made up of a number of separate and comparatively independent establishments, little principalities, as it were, each owing allegiance to its own sovereign, the chief of the bureau to which it belongs. The heads of departments of a navy-yard have extensive and responsible duties, and a large patronage, and are naturally jealous of the interference of any one but their own chiefs.

Thus each department has been gradually building itself up so as to be independent of all other departments, and is constantly striving to do all its own work. Each of the principal departments has its own body of artisans, its own machinery, its own steam generators, and its own peculiar method of doing business. As an illustration, we take from official "schedule of wages" (Form 9) of civil engineer's office the following ratings: Boiler-makers, boiler-makers' helper, calkers, coopers, cabinet-makers, core-makers, ship-joiners, ship-carpenters, machinists, machinists' helpers, molders, oakum-pickers, and pattern-makers—a little ship-yard in itself.

In this way it has come that some of our yards are filled up with machinery far beyond their actual needs, and it is no exaggeration to say that there is to-day enough machinery of various kinds in either the New York or Boston yard to do the work of its own particular class of the entire Navy during peace. We habitually speak of a private ship-yard as a "plant;" but each of our national ship-yards is a segregation of "plants," each having its own separate organization, and each its own internal regulations. Many illustrations might be given to show how, through the want of concert of action among these several "plants," useless and vexatious delays occur, to say nothing of the waste of time and of public money due to such diffusion.

To make such radical changes as we proposed in our memorandum was no easy task, nor did we expect that they could be effected without considerable friction, not to say opposition; but supposing the changes to be made on the basis laid down by the commission, it is hardly to be hoped that under present conditions they will be permanent. For whatever changes may be introduced now, and how beneficial soever they may be, still the same causes remaining in active operation must inevitably produce the same results, and in time restore the system of independent plants, with all its attendant evils. Hence we conclude that to organize our navy-yards on a just and permanent basis, to consolidate their several plants, to introduce thrift in the management and promptness in the methods of doing work, with a proper system of accountability; to secure, in short, in each of our yards unification, method, economy, and dispatch, with an administration of its affairs agreeable to the principles of business as understood in civil life, it is absolutely necessary to begin within the Navy Department itself.

Secretary Chandler seemed to have been of this opinion before, but he was confirmed in it now, for he recommended in his report, December, 1883, for both 1882 and 1883, that the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, of Steam-Engineering, and the work of equipment should be put under one head and one management. In this way, in my opinion, and in this way alone, will it ever be possible to bring the number of employés in the civil establishments of these different bureaus within proper bounds.

The Committee on Naval Affairs conferred with the chief of every bureau to find some way in which we could make a reduction in this establishment, but while now and then there was some chief who admitted that perhaps this or that officer might be dispensed with, yet in the majority of cases there was a demand even for an increase.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to ask my colleague on the committee, simply for information, whether it is his purposes to discuss at this time on this bill the question of the reorganization of the Department, because in that case some of us on this side may desire to modify the line of procedure which we had proposed to take in regard to this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I propose to discuss that matter only to this extent: I am endeavoring to show why, in this bill, we have not specified particularly the number of the employés, with the names and salary of each. I propose to show that we have undertaken in another bill to provide a system under which it can be done. I wish to show that we can not do it here.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have not the slightest objection to that discussion coming up; but it may, as I have said, modify the action which some of us on this side expected to take in regard to this appropriation bill, this being a bill to appropriate money to carry on the Navy, and the other question being an entirely distinct one, in regard to which there is a bill now on the Calendar of the House. I do not deprecate the discussion at all.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that this is an entirely separate question. I do not think I can intelligently discuss this bill and give to this Committee of the Whole the reasons why we were not able to follow exactly what seemed to be the course marked out for us by the law of the last Congress, without alluding to the difficulties which we have undertaken to remedy in the other bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then my friend, the chairman of the committee, will see very clearly that if this discussion is to go over the field of these two important bills, there is a necessity that the debate should not be restricted so closely as he suggested at the opening of the discussion.

Mr. HERBERT. Well, we have not been able to agree upon any limit to this discussion. If the discussion were limited, I should limit my remarks. It is because we were unable to agree upon a limit that I am going more fully into this question than I otherwise would. I will, however, say to my colleague on the committee that I do not propose now to discuss the details of the bill we have reported consolidating certain of these bureaus. I simply want to show, and I think it is legitimate I should do so, that the construction of the civil establishment of these different yards is something we could not get at in an appropriation bill; that the remedy is to be sought elsewhere; and it is legitimate for me to show that this was the view of Secretary Chandler, and that he so recommended to Congress.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is exactly the point I wanted to raise. If the question is to be discussed now, we may desire to show that the plan of reorganization which the gentleman advocates is not advisable.

Mr. HERBERT. I know that on this point my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Maine, differs with me. Which is right it will be for the House to decide when we reach that bill. I am confining myself now to this inherent difficulty encountered by the committee, and arising from the fact that each of these different bureaus has its own storekeepers, its own blacksmiths, its own clerks—all this supervisory force side by side in the same navy-yard, all paid from different appropriations, though all working on the same ship—and am endeavoring to make clear the reasons why we could not effect a greater reduction in these civil establishments.

Now, I deferred this portion of the discussion until I came to this bureau because the difficulty is very apparent right here. There was appropriated in the last bill $9,000 for the civil establishment of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. Of course it was the expectation that no more was to be spent; that is to say, it was the seeming expectation; yet the Committee on Appropriations must have known and did know there was danger that more would be spent, and in order to prevent this that committee last year induced the House to provide that there should be separate estimates submitted for this establishment in each bureau. Now, this estimate was made by the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting.

We have navy-yards at Kittery, Me., at Charlestown, Mass., at Brooklyn, N. Y., at League Island, at Washington, at Norfolk, at Pensacola, and at Mare Island. I will not go through with all of them, but I will take up one or two as samples. In the navy-yard at Kittery, Me., this Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting has altogether eleven persons. Little or nothing is being done there. Some work was done in the way of repairs last year; but at the time this estimate was made nothing was being done. There were, under this bureau, only eleven persons there. They had little to do except to take care of the property of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. These eleven included one clerk at $1,200 and another writer at $1,000, making two persons doing clerical duty where there were only eleven employés in all.

Then we come to the navy-yard at Charlestown, Mass. There is a rope-walk there, a very good one, too, I believe, conducted under the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. Rope is made well, and, according to the statements before us, which we have no reason to doubt, made at a reasonable expense. But all the employés at the Charlestown navy-yard numbered only fifty-seven, which seems to be about the average number for the year round.

Now, in addition to the superintendent of the rope-walk, there were two clerks and one writer; that is to say, three persons doing clerical duty for only fifty-seven employés. We supposed we could strike out one there. So our first estimate was to strike out a writer at Kittery navy-yard, Maine, and to strike out a clerk at the Boston navy-yard.

So when we went to Brooklyn, which is the principal navy-yard in the country, where more work is done than anywhere else, we found there two clerks and seventy persons. At League Island we found one clerk and eight employés; nothing is done at that yard. At Washington we found two clerks and one writer and seventy-nine employés altogether. All these in this single Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting.

Mr. GOFF. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HERBERT. Certainly.

Mr. GOFF. I understand you are stating this as evidence of the fact that the system itself is weak?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes; I am citing these facts to show that the system is weak.

Mr. GOFF. Now, could not the Secretary of the Navy by the stroke of his pen remedy the evil of which you complain?

Mr. HERBERT. No; not unless he is a stronger man than Secretary Chandler, and he was most earnest in favor of consolidation.

Mr. GOFF. What you seem to complain of is the excess of employés on the civil-list.

Mr. HERBERT. It is precisely that point, and if the House has paid attention to the letter read from the Clerk's desk it was precisely that point to which Secretary Chandler addressed himself. He failed in his effort to reduce the number of these employés because he was met with a protest from the chiefs of the bureaus in the Navy Department.

Mr. GOFF. In other words, those chiefs of bureaus report they have no more employés than the necessities of the service demand.

Mr. HERBERT. Of course they do.

Mr. GOFF. If the Secretary of the Navy thinks to the contrary and that the force is excessive can he not, nevertheless, reduce that force?

Mr. HERBERT. It seems that Secretary Chandler could not do it, for he tried in the most earnest way to accomplish that result. We have, if we did not know it otherwise, evidence from his letter, which has been read, that he knows how to use the English language——

Mr. GOFF. Do you not admit my proposition?

Mr. HERBERT. No.

Mr. GOFF. Can not the Secretary of the Navy reduce that force under the several bureaus if he issues his order to that effect?

Mr. HERBERT. Of course he can reduce the force somewhat, and it has been reduced in some degree, but not to the extent to which it ought to go. This can not be done under the present system.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now, is it not the fact that consolidation is going on in several of these bureaus under the present organization?

Mr. HERBERT. To a limited extent, yes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is it not true, as stated by concurrent testimony of the bureau officers, that it is perfectly competent for the Secretary of the Navy by order to accomplish all the reductions you desire?

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir; that is not the concurrent testimony of the bureau officers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is it not the testimony of every bureau officer, every officer of the Navy with the exception of Mr. Whitney (the Secretary) and Commodore Walker?

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman's memory is at fault, for there is no one more opposed to the consolidation which is sought to be secured than Commodore Harmony.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will include him also, and again ask whether it is not the testimony of every bureau officer, with the exception of Mr. Whitney (the Secretary), Commodore Walker, and Commodore Harmony, that these reductions can be accomplished under the present system by the order of the Secretary?

Mr. HERBERT. Those three gentlemen of course all testified in favor of the consolidation.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not consider there was a single other officer who appeared before the committee whose testimony was not that all these reforms can be accomplished by the administrative action of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman is at fault again. Commodore Schley did not agree it could be done.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not understand Commodore Schley as saying before the committee the proposed changes could not be made by order of the Secretary,

Mr. HERBERT. I remember his testimony right well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HERBERT. I did not know that I was consuming so much of the time of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended indefinitely.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HERBERT. I am very much obliged to my colleague on the committee and to the House. I am not going into what the bill contains, but I am merely speaking of the difficulties with which we had to contend. The gentleman seems to have forgotten the testimony of Commodore Schley. When he was asked by Mr. BUCK which of the three bureaus could be consolidated, or which three bureaus he named, he said:

Construction, Engineering, and Equipment Bureaus might be readily combined, because they appertain, you may say, in the same general way to construction. They all have to do with the construction of ships.

So much for the testimony of Commodore Schley on that particular point. But as I have said I do not propose to discuss the bill, but simply in this way to show why we could not appropriate separately and specifically for each of the employés. The first idea of the committee was to strike out from the civil establishment for this bureau one clerk at Kittery, Me., another at Charlestown, Mass., a clerk at Brooklyn, N. Y., one at Washington, a writer at Norfolk, a clerk at Mare Island, where they had one clerk and one writer to only thirteen employés; and that would have made a very much less sum than we have now in the bill.

But we were met by so many protests that we found ourselves unable in this as in other bureaus to bring the sum down as low as we desired. What were we to do? We had also the question to meet, which one of these clerks can be best spared? Who could best determine that question? We concluded to leave it to the Secretary of the Navy, acting in concert with the chiefs of the different bureaus. Therefore, while we have reduced to some extent the amount of the appropriation for the civil establishment in each one of these cases, we made the appropriations in lump sums.

As to the bill we have heretofore reported consolidating certain bureaus I believe its enactment would reduce these expenses as Commodore Walker estimated at least 33 per cent., besides rendering the service much more efficient.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I pass the Bureau of Yards and Docks. In this bill we have appropriated already for this purpose $272,000 against $244,000 last year, making a total increase of $28,000. We attempt to make and do make a reduction in the civil establishment and when we appropriated there as in the other bureaus a sum of money for the civil establishment, we provide that no other fund appropriated by this bill shall be used for the payment of such services.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I dislike very much to interrupt my colleague in his argument, but in order to preserve the continuity of the colloquy which took place between us a little while ago, I ask him to permit me to read a portion of the testimony of Commodore Schley upon this subject.

Mr. HERBERT. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. In response to the following question by myself:

Do you think the evils you point out—is it your idea that they require a statutory enactment to remove them?

He replied:

I said a moment ago that the difficulties appear more functional than organic. The law which creates the present organization of the Navy Department places its business and its administration in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, so that if it fails it must be administrative rather than organic. I can see that the present organization is defective, &c.

Simply sustaining the view I advanced that the testimony of the leading officer of the Department who came before the committee was that the apparent difficulties which exist, and I suppose that they are in all human affairs, are administrative rather than organic or functional.

Mr. HERBERT. My colleague is now discussing the particular provisions of the consolidation bill. I admit with him that Commodore Schley was opposed to the bill about which we examined him. But I quoted from his testimony for the purpose of showing that he agreed with me that certain difficulties under which we labored might be avoided by consolidating three of the bureaus; and I say he admits the difficulties as I have quoted him—difficulties which I think ought to be remedied by passing that bill. But I will not discuss that bill now. When it comes up I shall have something to say upon it.

Now, passing from the Bureau of Yards and Docks——

Mr. FELTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question before passing from that subject? I see in line 199 provision is made for contingent expenses that may arise at navy-yards and stations $20,000. I would like to know what is considered as contingent expenses. Is that at the discretion of the Department to be used for any purpose they may see proper? To be more explicit I will state the reason for the inquiry.

At the Mare Island navy-yard there is a marine corps, and no provision is made for housing them and they are living in stables and sheds to-day. I have been requested from the yard and from many of our people to give some attention to the subject of getting them properly housed. I suppose the expenditure of two or three thousand dollars would do it; and I simply desire to know whether the Department could appropriate up to that amount for that purpose from this fund.

Mr. WISE. This does not cover that at all.

Mr. HERBERT. This is to meet expenditures that can not ordinarily be foreseen, and would probably not cover the case to which the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON] alludes.

Now, as to the yards and docks, we not only appropriate $28,000 more to the whole bureau, but the sum total for repairs will exceed that for the current year by a still greater sum than $28,000, because we save for this purpose a portion of the sum that was heretofore taken from the appropriation for repairs and applied to the civil establishment. It will be noted by any one who has a book of estimates before him, that this civil establishment spent last year $96,000. There had been appropriated for it $59,000. The difference between $59,000 and $96,000 had been deducted from the $200,000 which had been given for repairs.

Now, instead of $96,000 we appropriate $74,000, and the difference between $74,000 and $96,000, namely, $22,000, which was formerly subtracted from repairs, will go to that purpose now. Thus $50,000 more will be available for repairs than heretofore.

The committee felt it was justified in recommending this larger expenditure for the reason that our navy-yards, most of them, are in a very dilapidated condition. This appropriation is not intended for the erection of any new dock, but is intended simply for the repair of yards, buildings, &c. We believe, however, this is a sufficient sum for that purpose.

Then we come to the naval asylum. The appropriation there is altogether an increase of some $14,000 over that for the current fiscal year. The principal item of increase is $10,000 for erecting a brick building for kitchen, &c., which seems to be very necessary. There is an item also of $4,500 for the repairs of buildings, which are much dilapidated. The committee was carrying out here, as everywhere in the bill, its purpose not to follow as a guide the appropriations for the current year, but to increase on these where it was necessary and to diminish them where it could with safety.

In the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery the appropriations last year were $125,000; this year they are $120,000.

I will not undertake to dwell on each of these separate bureaus because I am admonished I am consuming a great deal of time. But when we come to the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing we are confronted with some very interesting facts. As far back as 1843 the present system was established by which the Government furnishes to sailors their clothing, charging them cost price for it, and the fund which was appropriated originally for that purpose is turned over and over again and not paid back to the Government. It is a continuous appropriation. For a long time 10 per cent. was added to the cost in order to cover waste and other expenses. Some ten or twelve years ago it was deemed this was unfair to the sailor and the 10 per cent. was omitted; and since that time only the cost price has been charged to the sailor.

There is on hand now in money belonging to this bureau for clothing, $562,000; of clothing goods in store, $437,000; on shipboard, $241,000; making, in all, $1,242,000 in money and in clothing. We ask ourselves the question, what is the use for all this? It turns out that the average amount of expenditures for clothing the Navy for a year is $276,000. So that here is a supply on hand of money and clothing for four years and a half. The last appropriation that was made was in 1875. All the time since that date this—all that has not been wasted—has been on hand in that bureau.

Now, what has been the consequence? The answer is waste and extravagance. There has been a loss on sales of condemned clothing in the last ten years, of $272,000; and there has been a loss by the reduction in the price of clothing on hand which had to be reduced in order to adjust it to prices ruling in a falling market of $438,000.

In other words, this Government has lost in this bureau from these two causes in ten years, $710,000, and this does not account for the losses on clothing now on shipboard. And the losses do not stop here. We found on investigation that we had 6,069 pea-jackets on hand, which originally cost about $15 apiece, the present price being $11.50. We have 6,217 monkey-jackets on hand, valued now at $9.50 a piece.

We called for a list of the different articles on hand and the sales of each during the last fiscal year, and found that the number of pea-jackets taken by the sailors in 1885 amounted to six hundred and ninety-six. If these pea-jackets could last so long and not rot, and the sales should continue at the rate of ninety-six per annum, the Chief of the Bureau of Clothing might go to sleep and sleep as long as Rip Van Winkle, yes, as long as old Epimenides, his prototype, that is fifty-seven years, and wake up and find after his nap was finished that he still had a year's supply of pea-jackets on hand. But the truth is that these pea-jackets have become so worthless that the sailors refuse to take them. When the Secretary orders, as he will, a sale to clear out the worthless goods on hand the Government will pocket another loss of more than $100,000. We have on hand five and one-half years' supply of monkey-jackets; four and one-half years' supply of bue cloth trousers; three and one-half years' supply of satinet; twelve years' supply of canvas duck; four and one-half years' supply of caps; twenty years' supply of mattress covers; twenty years' supply of boots.

Now, the committee believe that this state of things ought not to be permitted to continue; so we propose to utilize in other ways a portion of the clothing fund (as the chief of the bureau admits we can do); and we take $250,000 from the clothing fund and transfer it to the appropriation for provisions in the same bureau. Then we come to "small stores" in this same bureau. The books show that in stores and money the bureau has on hand a six years' supply. These small stores consist of pipes, tobacco, needles, thread, and things of that character.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. When were all these things purchased?

Mr. HERBERT. Many of them were purchased ten or twelve years ago, but some of them only a few years back. In the small stores account we find that Paymaster Smith at one time two or three years ago purchased over five thousand ditty-boxes. It was supposed that the sailors would want them to hold their needles and tobacco and pipes and such things, and he laid in a liberal supply, five thousand, at $2.50 apiece, making $12,500. Few or none of them were ever sold, and they are still on hand.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is the man who purchased them still on hand?

Mr. HERBERT. I think he has been court-martialed and suspended. We take $250,000 from "clothing" and $75,000 from "small stores," and still leave enough on hand for clothing and small stores.

We come next to the Bureau of Construction and Repair. For this bureau we appropriate very nearly the same amount as for the present fiscal year. It is true that a much larger sum was asked, but in the opinion of the committee the Government ought not to go on expending money on rotten wooden ships. As I said before, the old navy is passing away. We should expend only enough money to take care of it in decent order until we can take steps, as in my opinion we should, to build a new navy.

I will not stop now to read the figures, but I will say that the expenditures made in recent years for the repair of the Mohican, the Omaha, and the Mohegan can not be justified.

In the Naval Academy appropriation we have made an increase here and there, and have cut down here and there.

The additions and subtractions are very inconsiderable, and there is, perhaps, nothing in that portion of the bill that would justify me in dwelling upon it.

The last appropriation in the bill is for the Marine Corps. In this we have reduced the amount given for clothing. Here the clothing is dealt out to the marines as part of their pay, as it is in the Army; and so there is an annual appropriation for the purpose of paying the expense of clothing the marines. On examining the question, we thought it proper to cut down the appropriation for clothing from $77,000 to $50,000. Taking into consideration the cost of this clothing, some $33 for each man and boy, and taking into consideration also the number of men and boys in the service, we reached the conclusion that the appropriation proposed in the bill added to the stock of clothing now on hand will give about two years' supply in money and clothing, and this we deemed sufficient. We have also cut down all along in these civil establishments.

I have now gone through this bill. I have occupied more time than I had expected; but that time is not wasted if I have succeeded in enabling any portion of the House to understand clearly the figures in the bill as we understand them. I trust that the Committee of the Whole will agree with the Committee on Naval Affairs that this bill ought to be passed substantially as it is. But as a matter of course the bill is here for consideration, and the Committee of the Whole will deal with it as in its discretion it may deem proper. Our work is before you. All I can say in conclusion is that we have labored upon this bill diligently; and we have sought faithfully on the one hand to provide for the necessities of the Navy, and on the other to do the fullest measure of justice to the Government.

Allow me one word further in answer to an inquiry which has been made. I have been asked whether we have provided in this bill for any new ships. Gentlemen who have heard my remarks know that I have stated we have not. It would not have been in order for us to do so. We could not on this bill provide for anything new. All that must come in a separate bill.

Mr. GOFF. In this connection, will the chairman of the committee state why it is that no appropriation is made in this bill for the completion of the monitors? That would have been practicable here.

Mr. HERBERT. We have put that on the bill for the new navy.

Mr. GOFF. I know you have; but I asked why was not an appropriation made in this bill (where it would have been eminently practicable) for the completion of these vessels.

Mr. HERBERT. I might ask why my colleague on the committee did not insist on that course in the committee, but that would not be a proper question. I will say that the appropriation for the completion of the monitors would be in the nature of new work, and that it was thought proper to put everything of that kind into one bill, as we have done—a bill which is before the House. One reason which influenced me in this matter—and I think it had weight with other gentlemen—was that if we should make a partial appropriation in this bill, if we should appropriate something here toward the increase of the Navy, that might be used as an argument why we should never get at the other bill, why we should never do anything substantial.

I would leave that bill to stand as a bill for the increase of the Navy, containing everything for that purpose; and when we shall have passed it, as I believe we will, we shall have accomplished something we can remember with pride. I believe all the true friends of the Navy will act with us in the effort to reach that bill on which we propose to provide for new armored vessels and new cruisers—to take the initiative in the construction of a new navy.

Mr. GOFF. As the gentleman was explaining in detail the full features of this bill, and giving the reasons why the committee had reported such a bill, I thought it proper he should call the attention of the House to that omission—not that I was not aware of the action of the committee and the motive which influenced some menbers of it in reaching that conclusion.

Mr. HERBERT. The reasons are as I have stated; and I am obliged to the gentleman for calling my attention to the point.

Mr. BUCK Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to follow through the various items which have been alluded to and explained by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. HERBERT]. I will only say, in a general way, that I approve of the general features of the bill, and think it a measure in the interest of economy and the well-ordering of the Navy Department. I wish to call attention to one or two points on which I have been obliged to disagree with the majority of the committee. One of those is in regard to the naval war college at Coasters', Harbor Island, near Newport, R. I. This may be considered a small matter and unworthy the attention of the committee, but I think we make a serious mistake if we fail to appropriate for the maintenance of that college. It was established by an order of Secretary Chandler in October, 1884, for the purpose of instructing officers of the Navy in the higher branches of study connected with the naval service and which are necessary to be understood by all officers who are to serve in the Navy. I will only cite a few paragraphs in the report made to Secretary Chandler by Rear-Admiral Luce, of the Navy, touching the reasons for the establishment and maintenance of this college. He says:

It is found that numbers of young officers after a little experience at sea take up of their own accord those studies for which they have developed a taste; it may be ordnance, astronomy, electricity, steam, history, international law, or the languages. There are others who, possessed of undoubted ability, do not exert themselves in the direction of self-improvement for want of proper facilities, or, perhaps, of an incentive—men who could take a high stand in almost any branch were the opportunity offered or the motive power applied.

For years past the Bureau of Ordnance has recognized the existence in the service of a large amount of talent that could be utilized for its own special purposes, and it has always encouraged officers to qualify themselves in that particular line. It now finds its reward in a body of capable and efficient assistants.

The present admirable post-graduate course at the torpedo station is due solely to the enlightened policy of that bureau.

In the establishment of the proposed school the Navy Department would be doing for all professional branches what the Bureau of Ordnance has been long doing to supply its own particular needs. It would, moreover, consolidate the instruction in each into a well-organized and homogeneous system.

* * * * * * *

A more extended course in mechanics, gun construction, &c., is necessitated by the very great advances that are being constantly made in ordnance; while recent hydrographic work, the exact determination of latitudes and longitudes, in the many cases where this still remains to be effected, the addition of iron ships to the Navy, involving the necessity of precise evolution of their magnetic constants, &c., show how imperative is the demand for higher instruction in surveying, nautical astronomy, and practical physics.

Now the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, cited with approbation Rear-Admiral Luce on another matter. It seems to me if Rear-Admiral Luce is such good authority on another matter he may be considered as good authority in this matter. I know there may be a bit of sentiment about this naval war college. I have the greatest regard for the opinion of my colleagues on the Committee on Naval Affairs, but it did seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that they failed properly to appreciate the importance of a naval school of a higher grade, as this is. I think whatever may have been their motives, and they were good ones I know, they were founded on a misjudgment of what the real object is and what the results of this naval war college have been.

It has only been established a short time. It is a young institution, but the reports of the officers in charge of that naval war college show a commendable degree of progress there.

The appropriation asked for this year was $14,000. Last year we appropriated only $8,000.

It was suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] that it would be as well if we removed it to Annapolis. Then why not put some clause in the bill removing it to Annapolis if gentlemen wish to have it there?

But, sir, I will make this suggestion in regard to the proposition of removal: That it would be equally appropriate to remove Harvard College or Yale College to the vicinity of the high school of Washington, Saint Louis, or Chicago, or near some preparatory school, so as to have both the higher and lower branches taught at the same place. I think this school could be located at Annapolis, where the academy is; but it seems to me that to mix up the post-graduates with an undergraduate system is altogether at war with the system of education which has been maintained in this country for a number of years and sanctioned by the very best instructors and scholars that we have.

I regret, therefore, that no appropriation has been put into this bill for the maintenance of that naval war college, and I give notice at the proper time, if nobody else does it, I will move an amendment making provision for it.

Mr. SAYERS. Is there any authority other than the order of Secretary Chandler for the establishment of that naval war college?

Mr. BUCK. I am not aware of a statutory provision for it, but it has been recognized and provided for in appropriation bills since 1884, and it was appropriated for in the bill for last year, appropriating $8,000, and that has been held as sufficient authority for the maintenance of this college. But I will not detain the committee longer in reference to that item.

I should prefer, of course, that this college should be located at New London, where there are public buildings and where the officers could be accommodated; but I do not wish to do anything which will result in blotting out what I think is a very promising institution.

Now, as to changes in the items in the bill. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] has made a clear and elaborately prepared statement of this bill. He understands these various items, for he has given the most careful attention to every one of them. He has alluded to some of the reasons why they have cut down amounts in the bill from last year. It will be found on examination that these differences consist of two classes—one of deductions growing out of the discovery of amounts in the various Departments which go to the account of surplus, and the other of items which have been authorized by law and have been appropriated for in former years and have been estimated for this year, but have been taken out of this bill, where they could have been placed, and put into the new-ship bill; and the gentleman from Alabama ingeniously and happily said they would help to pass that bill.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the way the difference between this bill and the bill of last year is made up, and to show that so far from there being a less amount appropriated in this bill than in the bill of last year there is really more, if we take into consideration the recommendations of the new ship bill.

In the first place the bill appropriates $11,849,858.70. Last year, that is, for the current year, it was $15,029,704.95. That makes a decrease of $3,179,846.25. In round numbers it is three millions of decrease from the appropriation of last year.

How is that account made up? Why, in this way: In the first place in the bill of 1885, that is to say, in the act of March 3, of that year, provision was made for the construction of two cruisers and two gunboats at a cost of $1,895,000. That money has not been used. It is conceded in the report which goes with this bill that in comparing the present bill with that which preceded it this sum should be deducted from the latter. It should therefore be taken into the account in making up the difference between the present bill and the appropriation for the current fiscal year.

That, the gentleman from Alabama says, should be so counted, and he has so stated in his report. But there are other items that come in; there is the item for the "Pay of the Navy," which amounts to $576,380.24. Now, in the course of the investigation which the committee made they found that under the head of "Pay of the Navy," there would be at the end of the fiscal year 1886 this sum of $576,380.24 for which no use could befound; that is to say, that after all of the bills had been paid which were authorized by law there would still remain this fund for which no use is provided under the law, and we thought proper, therefore, to deduct that from the estimates of the Department.

I think the gentleman from Alabama, therefore, was probably correct in the position he took that this pay fund of the Navy, being surplus money, should be used, provided we could not reasonably anticipate an emergency in the next year for which it might be used. I can not anticipate any, and hope that none will arise.

I do not believe there will be any, unless the gentleman from Maine succeeds in stirring up the House to such a pitch of excitement that we shall send all of the Navy we have now into Canadian waters to protect the schooners and fishing vessels like the David J. Adams and others which have been seized by the Canadian authorities. The money is lying in the Treasury subject to order whenever it can be used under existing law; and if we fail to make any appropriation for these estimates that have been made running to that extent, then the Department must take that sum of $576,000 and upward and use it. So that by omitting in our bill to appropriate for expenses that are authorized by law we oblige those in charge of this Department to use this money.

In other words, we do precisely the same thing as if we appropriated the money and still allowed them to have the surplus remaining of $576,380.24. That is all there is of it, so that this sum should be counted in. We are really taking and using it. It goes to make the sum total of the bill. We have held it as trustees, you may say, for the public up to this time; but now we propose to use it, so that in effect we are appropriating that sum of money to be used in the next fiscal year instead of allowing it to remain as a surplus fund in the Department.

The same also may be said, Mr. Chairman, of the surplus fund arising from the pay of the Marine Corps, and that, the gentleman from Alabama has said, was $200,000. I believe he is in error in that respect, since the exact amount is $217,964.94.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, it is; but we only utilized $200,000 of it.

Mr. BUCK. Yes; I was about to state that $200,000 of it will be used; but still the actual amount is as I have stated, and I will show the gentleman presently the reason why I call attention to this. In the clothing account there is also a fund amounting to some $250,000, and in the "small-stores account" there is a fund of $75,000. Now, that completes the list of items which, I submit, should go into the appropriation bill of this year and be added as a part of the sum total of the bill. They belong to it, because although they are items which grow out of a surplus in years past, and which have been discovered upon an examination, still they form a part of the fund which is in effect appropriated by this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I know my colleague desires to be correct; and, if he will permit me, I will call his attention to this point——

Mr. BUCK. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. I think he is in error in one respect. I admit that all of these items have been incorporated in this bill and that money is to be used for this year. But when you take $576,380.24 from the pay of the Navy, $200,000 from the pay of the Marine Corps, $250,000 from the clothing account, and $75,000 from the small-stores, and add that to the $1,895,000, and then add the total to the amount of the bill, it still falls $200,000 short of the bill of last year.

Mr. BUCK. That is true; but the gentleman will remember that I have only called attention to one class of the items I proposed to add. I have not yet concluded my statement, and the gentleman will see when I get through the relation it has to the point I am now discussing.

I have already stated that there were two classes of accounts to be added to the bill. After I had closed my remarks on the first class the gentleman from Alabama interrupted me and stated it was not sufficient to make up the total of this bill to a sum equal to that of the bill of last year. Although conceding my position as to these surplus items to be correct, he makes that suggestion. Now I am only through with one-half of my remarks, and the gentleman will see in a moment the point I wish to make.

In the present year the Department of Yards and Docks asked an appropriation providing for the general maintenance of yards and docks of $300,000. That is the estimate for this year. Last year they used $200,000——

Mr. HERBERT. My colleague does not mean, I suppose, to be understood as saying——

Mr. BUCK. They appropriated it.

Mr. HERBERT. But is it not true that they took some $60,000 and used it for the payment of the civil establishment?

Mr. BUCK. But the appropriation for the current year for the maintenance of yards and docks was $200,000.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, that was the appropriation; but we are giving now a great deal more for yards and docks, some $50,000 or $60,000, and yet the bill will be $200,000 less, counting all these items you mention.

Mr. BUCK. I know the fact which the gentleman states, but I am going to add other items and show that you will overrun the bill of last year.

I was about to say that instead of giving to the Bureau of Yards and Docks $300,000, as they called for in the estimates, we have given them $190,000 for the maintenance of yards and docks; that is, to keep the yards and docks in proper repair and to keep the plant in shape. We give them in the new ship bill $250,000 for the same purpose.

Mr. SAYERS. That bill has not passed yet.

Mr. HERBERT. We will admit all that.

Mr. BUCK. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], has said to the committee he expects that new ship bill will pass. He knows as well as I do that I shake hands with him on that and hope it will become a law. But what I am getting at now is to show that the gentleman from Alabama has taken money when called for by the Bureau of Yards and Docks and has not appropriated it in the appropriation bill, where it could have been put, but has put it in the new-ship bill. And I do not propose he shall make use of that as being in the line of economy except for what it is worth. I think the money should be used for the maintenance of those yards, but I want to show to the committee exactly the difference between this bill and the bill of last year, not that I am finding any fault with it.

But, as I have already said, we give $190,000 in this bill and $250,000 in the new-ship bill for yards and docks. The gentleman from Alabama will remember also the estimate sent in for the improvement of the plant in the Washington navy-yard, amounting to $38,894. They are doing some very excellent work there in the line of constructing heavy ordnance. Now, this appropriation for yards and docks has been divided and a part of it put in the appropriation bill and a part of it in the ship bill, but we must count it wherever it is.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BUCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. No part of those submitted items are in this bill.

Mr. BUCK. What submitted items?

Mr. SAYERS. The item for the improvement of equipment plant at the Washington navy-yard is not here. None of those items occur in this bill.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman will find in the Book of Estimates an estimate for equipment plant at the Washington navy-yard, $38,894.

Mr. SAYERS. Not a dollar of which is appropriated in this bill.

Mr. BUCK. And then under the general head of maintenence of yards and docks there is an appropriation of $190,000. The law is so worded that the $250,000 appropriated in the ship bill can be used for it; that is to say, for the same purpose.

Then, again, I wish to speak of the provision in the new-ship bill for the manufacture of torpedoes. I am unable to recall the language of the statute as authorizing the making of any torpedoes, if there is any. But I think there is authority for it in a former appropriation bill, if nowhere else. I will not state it on my own authority, because I do not recall the language of the statute or the time it was passed, but I judge they have been authorized by law, because these torpedoes have been frequently estimated for, and once or twice have been provided for in appropriation bills.

I wish to say that the Government of the United States does not own a single automobile torpedo at the present time, as I understand it. For torpedoes there was an estimate made in the Book of Estimates, which we had before us. The estimate was $250,000. We do not appropriate a cent for torpedoes in this bill; but we do appropriate in the new ship bill $125,000 to carry out and conform to that estimate for torpedoes. Then again we appropriate in addition to that a large sum for the armament of vessels——

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. BUCK. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman says there is an appropriation for the torpedo corps in the new ship bill of $220,000.

Mr. BUCK. Not in the new ship bill. The sum for torpedoes in that bill is $125,000. It is for the manufacture or purchase of torpedoes.

Mr. SAYERS. And that we make no appropriation for that in this appropriation bill. This estimate of $250,500 embraces also estimates of $65,000, of $7,000, and of $2,500 for labor, material, &c., for torpedoes, of which there is appropriated in this bill $50,500.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman's figures differ from mine. The sum I find on page 113 of the Estimates is $250,000. However that may be, you have appropriated $125,000 for this purpose in the new-ship bill. The figures of the gentleman from Texas include ordnance as well as torpedoes. I say we have appropriated $125,000 in the new-ship bill for torpedoes. It must be based on that estimate, if it is based on anything, mixed in with other ordnance and other things as it is.

The gentleman reminds me there is an appropriation for torpedoes here. I wish to show that there is still remaining $125,000 that goes into the new-ship bill for torpedoes, but which should be counted against the Naval Affairs Committee when they say they are appropriating a less amount than last year. I approve of the appropriation most cordially and heartily, but I want to show the exact condition of things.

Mr. HERBERT. If the gentleman will permit me I would remark that I have never said we propose to appropriate less than was appropriated last year, taking the two bills together; nothing of the kind. Suppose we do appropriate more. I think we ought to appropriate more. We are in favor of increasing the Navy.

Mr. BUCK. The explanation of the gentleman from Alabama is to the point. I do not criticise him in the position he took. I am only stating what I thought he omitted to state; that is all.

We come now to the next and last item that I shall allude to, and that is the item of $1,000,000 which is put into the new-ship bill. Now, where does that properly belong? What is it for? In the first place, it is for the armament for vessels under the act of March 3, 1885—the two cruisers and the two gunboats.

Mr. HERBERT. It is for that only in part.

Mr. BUCK. That is an item that is authorized by law and is in the estimate book, but, whether it was in the estimate book or not, we could have appropriated for it, because a law existed which called for the appropriation. However, instead of appropriating for it in the appropriation bill, we have seen fit to put it into the new-ship bill. That is all right, and I hope it will pass; but it is there and must be counted. To provide the armament for these vessels will take a part of the million dollars.

There is another item which the $1,000,000 applies to—that is, the armament of the ships that are provided for in the new-ship bill. The Department is to go to that $1,000,000 to get funds for the armament for these new ships; also for the armament of the unfinished monitors and for the Miantonomoh. Every one of these items is authorized by law and can be appropriated for if we see fit, with the exception of the items providing for the ten ships in the new-ship bill. They were authorized by law, and we could have put them into the appropriation bill, but we saw fit not to do so, but to put them into the new-ship bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. And they would have been put into the appropriation bill if it had not been for the new-ship bill.

Mr. BUCK. Certainly, they could have been put into this appropriation bill, but they have been put into the ship bill, and if that will have the effect predicted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] of forcing the passage of that bill, I shall be very glad that they are there. Still, they should be counted in making up this general deduction from last year.

Now, adding these three sums together, they make $1,375,000, which should be added to the items that I have already described. But we must remember that one of the items has not yet been authorized by law, so that we could not have appropriated for it if we would; that is, the armament of the ships in the new bill, so I take out one-half of the amount ($1,000,000) appropriated for that purpose in the new-ship bill. I assume that the Secretary of the Navy will favor the building of new ships, and will take one-half of it to put into the vessels that are authorized by the new-ship bill, and will apply the rest of it to the ships that are authorized by the act of March 3, 1885, and to the monitors and the Miantonomoh. Therefore, I think the gentleman from Alabama will agree with me that it is at least fair to take out $500,000 from this $1,000,000 provided for armament.

Now, by deducting $500,000 from $1,375,000, which is the amount appropriated for yards and docks, torpedoes and general armament, added together, the amount left to be added to the items of pay of the Navy and the other surplus account is $875,000. That, added to the other items that I have described (I will not go through them again in detail), including $1,895,000 in the act of March 3, 1885, amounting to $2,996,300.24, will make the sum of $3,871,300.24 which I think ought to be added to the bill of this year, and then we can draw a proper comparison between the present appropriation bill and the bill of last year. That is the amount, after I have deducted $500,000 of the $1,000,000 appropriated in the new-ship bill for general armament.

Mr. HERBERT. You think you ought to take $3,871,300.24 out of the new-ship bill and put it in against $1,800,000, in order to make this bill larger than that?

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman from Alabama knows how much I am in favor of the new-ship bill, and when he suggests that I would take away any part of it in order to injure it he makes the suggestion facetiously, not in earnest.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. BUCK. So, Mr. Chairman, I say that we should add the sum of $3,871,300.24 to the amount carried by this bill, which makes it $15,721,158.94, and then there will be an increase over the appropriation bill of last year of $691,453.99, provided we add these items which were estimated for, and which would undoubtedly have been put into this bill if they had not been put into the other, and which we have considered as carefully and discriminately as any other items in the bill.

When I started out on this comparison between the bill of last year and the bill of this year I little anticipated that my friends would interpose so many suggestions, but I have yet to hear from any gentleman a suggestion that the position I have assumed in regard to these items is not entirely correct, namely, that they should be counted as against the Committee on Naval Affairs—not that I think they are wrong; I shall vote for them most cheerfully; but while I want the gentlemen who represent the majority on this floor to gather up all the crumbs of political comfort they possibly can, I am not willing that they should secure this little item and call it economy merely because it is not put into the appropriation bill but is put into another bill.

The committee will bear me out on this, that I have not touched at all upon that tender, nervous, irritable subject, the five monitors. If we had touched upon that, I do not know how it might have affected this discussion. There are differences on that matter wide and vast. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], my colleague on the committee, who is now looking at me smilingly, would differ, I suppose, entirely from myself about the history of those vessels, the propriety of finishing them, and what they would be good for after being finished. But I say nothing on that subject. I confine myself to these particular items, and say that each one of them could have been appropriated for in the appropriation bill.

In regard to the pay of the Navy, it has been suggested to me by a gentleman who is high authority on this matter that as to the $576,380.24 surplus, it will be necessary in order to make it available that it be reappropriated. I am inclined to think this position is correct. It seems to me on principle it ought to be so.

Mr. HERBERT. I think so myself, under the present decisions.

Mr. HISCOCK. As the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] has referred, I suppose, to a remark of mine, I desire to say, although I do not claim to be very high authority on this subject, that in my opinion every annual appropriation bill carries appropriations for that fiscal year only, not for any other; and therefore if there is a surplus appropriated on any item, that surplus can not be used in the next fiscal year without a reappropriation. But I trust there will be nothing in the form of a reappropriation. I believe every surplus thus arising should be covered into the Treasury, and whatever money may be required for another year should be provided in a new appropriation. If there ever was a vicious practice, it is the practice of reappropriating unexpended balances of previous appropriations.

Mr. BUCK. I think the suggestions of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] are certainly in the proper line; and the chairman of the committee [Mr. HERBERT] seems to concede that there should be a provision for reappropriating or for making a new appropriation.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope we shall never reappropriate an unexpended balance. Every surplus appropriation of this kind should be allowed to lapse into the Treasury. The practice of reappropriating is objectionable and vicious, because it seems like trying to steal from one year's fund for the benefit of another, and thus improperly to get credit for apparent economy. Under such a system the people do not know how much money we are actually appropriating from time to time.

Mr. BUCK. Whatever may have been the practice or whatever may now be the law, it was the understanding of the committee that this surplus of $576,380.24 could be used without any reappropriation, and that the appropriations in the bill could be reduced by that amount. But notwithstanding these suggestions, it seems to me the position is sound that, if we allow that surplus of $576,380.24 to stand without reappropriation, we permit that surplus to be returned into the Treasury, and must appropriate a corresponding amount in the bill or else make an insufficient provision for the service. Hence I submit I am correct in my conclusion that we have this year recommended appropriations larger than those of last year.

Not wishing to occupy further time, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] the residue of my hour.

Mr. HEPBURN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise, as it is near 5 o'clock, when the House adjourns under the special order.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask by unanimous consent there be an evening session to consider reports of the Committee on Labor.

Mr. KING. There are very few members present.

Mr. BURROWS. I shall object unless the hour is fixed for closing the evening session.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am willing to have it close at 10 o'clock,

Mr. BURROWS. With that understanding I withdraw objoction.

Mr. PETERS. I demand the regular order.

The hour of 5 p. m. having arrived, the House adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BUTLER. I present a report of a committee of the American Medical Association, memorializing Congress on the prevention of yellow fever. The memorial appears to be in aid of a bill now before Congress looking to the appointment of a commission with a view to preventing the introduction of yellow fever by inoculation. I move the reference of the paper to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. The memorial is accompanied by a letter from Dr. Gaston, of Atlanta, who forwarded it to me. I should be glad to have this report printed, as it relates to a very important subject certainly, for the use of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the paper presented by him be printed in the ordinary document form. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of Charles Bock, a pension claimant under claim No. 292072, late a member of Company F, Second Illinois Light Artillery, now seventy-one years old, and his wife is sixty-seven, praying an increase of the rate of pension allowed him by law. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON presented four petitions, signed by 89 dairymen and butter-makers of Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill regulating the sale of and taxing imitation butter; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Mrs. Sophia B. King and others, of Worcester, Washington County, Vermont, praying that the pension of David G. King, late a private of Company E, Eighth Regiment Vermont Volunteers, may be increased from $50 to $72 per month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of J. C. Gibson, of Richmond, Va., praying that there may be a Federal code of procedure; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent, out of time, as I feel obliged, on account of the illness of my colleague [Mr. MORRILL], to go up to see him, though I am glad to say he is not dangerously ill, to introduce a bill out of order.

[The bill appears under the appropriate head.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of the board of county supervisors of Linn County, Iowa, praying for the passage of the bill providing for indemnity for swamp lands sold or otherwise disposed of by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present the memorial of a large number of attorneys of different towns in the State of Nebraska, remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 7216, which has reference to the location of courts of the United States in the district of Nebraska. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I present two memorials of citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of the oleomargarine bill. They are addressed to my colleague [Mr. DAWES] and myself, but evidently intended as memorials to the Senate. I move the reference of the memorials to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of 222 dairy farmers of Vermont and New Hampshire, praying for the passage of the bill regulating and taxing imitation butter; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of the local organizations of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union in each State and Territory, I think—I have a list of them here, which I will not enumerate—most earnestly pleading and protesting against all legislation by Congress, in any form, that may conflict with the laws enacted by States prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages, or that may impair the efficiency of such laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The petition will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR. I present also a petition from the same body in all the States and Territories, in which they most respectfully and earnestly ask that the bill passed by the United States Senate and now pending before the House, to provide for a national commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic and its relations to the public welfare, may have early concurrence. The bill having passed, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8066) to pension Martha A. Vorhees, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2609) granting a pension to Emily C. Stannard, to report it without amendment. The report is not ready, and I ask leave to submit the report subsequently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Leave will be granted.

INVESTIGATION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HARRISON. The Committee on Indian Affairs was directed by resolutions of the Senate adopted June 11 and December 3, 1884, and February 3, 1885, to inquire into the condition of the Indians in the Indian Territory and upon other reservations. A partial report in response to those resolutions was submitted some days ago by the chairman of the committee [Mr. DAWES], and I now submit a further report, and ask that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made under the general rule. The report will be laid on the table.

HOUSE COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 76) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees of the House of Representatives shall begin, have instructed me to report it without amendment; and as it is a matter which relates to the House organization, the payment of clerks, I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that the pay of the clerks to committees of the House of Representatives which have been or may be hereafter authorized by the House, who are paid during the session only, shall begin from the time such clerks entered upon the discharge of their duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairman of the several committees employing clerks for the session only.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURIFICATION OF WATER-SUPPLY.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back the letter of the Secretary of War with the accompanying documents, being maps and reports relative to the advisability and practicability of providing the water supply of the capital with filters and other appliances for cleansing and purifying the water, which information was called for under a Senate resolution of February 8, 1886. It is considered of sufficient importance by the committee to recommend the printing of the usual number, with no extra copies. I therefore move that the usual number of the communication and accompanying documents be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD ATTORNEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair lays before the Senate——

Mr. BECK. If the morning business is closed, I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 2578) to prohibit members of Congress from acting as attorneys or employés for railroad companies holding charters or having received grants of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States. The motion to reconsider was made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. INGALLS. Does not the resolution I offered yesterday, that comes up this morning, have precedence?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does. The resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] comes over, under objection, and is part of the morning business. The Chair is also of the opinion, and the Senator from Kentucky is informed, that under the order adopted the day before yesterday no business can be considered to-day except under the eighth rule.

Mr. BECK. I have been trying for ten days and giving notice day by day that I should call up the bill which passed the Senate upon a call of the yeas and nays by a vote of 37 to 11, and a motion was made to reconsider. I have faithfully tried day after day to get a decision in regard to that motion; and I think there must be some time when one man's motion can not tie up a bill that has passed upon a call of the yeas and nays by a vote of 37 to 11, and I do not think any order can be made to deprive me of my right. If that can be done, then one man can defeat any bill after it has been passed.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire if the Senator from Kentucky proposes to object to debate or discussion on the motion to reconsider the bill?

Mr. BECK. I allowed the motion to lie over until now, hoping that the Committee on Rules would report a rule making the question debatable. If they do not, I am willing that unanimous consent shall be had for debate in this case. If the bill will not bear discussion it is of no value.

DEPARTMENTAL CLERKS—CIVIL SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], which came over under objection, is now the order of business clearly, as part of the morning business. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. INGALLS, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the Senate the following information:

First. The number of clerks now embraced within the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, A. D. 1883, who were removed from office in the several Executive Departments, and the number of such clerks who were appointed to office in the several Executive Departments under the civil-service rules from July 16, A. D. 1883, to March 4, A. D. 1885, not including in such removals and appointments clerks excepted from examination by Rule XIX of the amended civil-service rules.

Second. The number of clerks embraced within the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883, who were removed from office in the several Executive Departments and the number of such clerks who were appointed to office in the several Executive Departments under the civil-service rules from March 4, A. D. 1885, to June 15, A. D. 1886, not including in such removals and appointments clerks excepted from examination by Rule XIX of the amended civil-service rules.

Third. The number and names of chiefs of division and chief clerks who were removed from office in the several Executive Departments from July 16, A. D. 1883, to March 4, A. D. 1885, and the number and names of such chiefs of division and chief clerks who were appointed to office during the same period, and the number of such appointments which were made by promotion.

Fourth. The number and names of chiefs of division and chief clerks who were removed from office in the several Executive Departments from March 4, A. D. 1885, to June 15, 1886, and the number and names of such chiefs of division and chief clerks who were appointed to office during the same period, and the number of such appointments which were made by promotion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. VANCE. I have no objection to the resolution just read, but I ask to have an amendment adopted which I send to the desk.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina is read I ask leave to make one or two suggestions of amendment in the original text, if he will allow me, to which I think there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be quite in order at any rate.

Mr. INGALLS. In the third paragraph, after the words "removed from office," I move to insert "or reduced in grade."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator modifies the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a modification of the resolution.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the second line of the third paragraph it is proposed to insert the words "or reduced in grade;" so as to read:

The number and names of chiefs of division and chief clerks who were removed from office or reduced in grade in the several Executive Departments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas so modifies the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Also in the fourth paragraph, after the words "removed from office," I propose to insert the words "or reduced in grade;" so as to read:

The number and names of chiefs of divisions and chief clerks who were removed from office or reduced in grade in the several Executive Departments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified, The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] offers an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new paragraph:

5. And that the President be requested to further inform the Senate how many appointments were made in each of the Departments of officials within the scope of the civil-service act between the date of the approval of the said act, the 16th of January, 1883, and the 15th of July, 1883, when said act went into effect, together with the names of said appointees, the places to which they were appointed, and whether to fill vacancies made by removals or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

RAILROAD ATTORNEYS.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to say a word or two in response to the remark made by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow me, I rose only for the purpose of withdrawing my request, after reading the rule for this morning. I was not aware that it extended to to-day as well, until the President kindly sent it to me.

Mr. HAWLEY. For the very reason that the matter has now gone over I should like to say a word or two in reference to what the Senator from Kentucky said.

Mr. BECK. Let me say only this: I shall endeavor to call up the motion to reconsider on Monday morning, and I desire very much that the Committee on Rules should report the rule suggested. I will postpone it until Tuesday or Wednesday if necessary, so that the Committee on Rules can report a rule to allow motions of that character to be debated. I want that done; and perhaps the matter had better remain until, say, Tuesday morning, to give the committee time to report. I think the Senate will agree to their report as soon as they make it.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Kentucky in the remarks he first made said he had been trying for ten days to get up this motion to reconsider, and he thought it strange if the motion of one man could prevent the final passage of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I had no reference to any individual.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to make it clear that no reproach of that kind lies against me. I entered the motion to reconsider and was ready to reconsider it that day or the next, and the two propositions to delay have come from the Senator from Kentucky, and very reasonably, because he desired to have the rule altered which prevents debate on a motion to reconsider. I assented to that; but I have never asked for any delay, and have been ready to consider the matter at any day briefly, and I proposed to consider it; and both propositions bodily have come from him.

Mr. BECK rose.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask unanimous consent, if the Senator will hear me before he proceeds——

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that when the motion to reconsider is taken up, without affecting at all the time when it shall be taken up, it be debatable.

Mr. BECK. I hope that will be done.

Mr. HOAR. I think the rule was put in by inadvertence; and my suggestion is in this particular matter that when the motion to reconsider is taken up it shall be debatable. That will solve the whole matter.

Mr. HARRISON. As the Senator from Kentucky has already suggested deferring this matter until a time when probably the rule will be before us, would it not be better to await application for unanimous consent until that time, which will undoubtedly then be given?

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not object, because the Committee on Rules may not meet for several days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that when the motion to reconsider the bill referred to is pending the rule shall not be enforced which prohibits debate on a motion to reconsider. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BECK. Then I give notice that I shall endeavor on Tuesday to call it up. That will give the Committee on Rules an opportunity to make their report, hoping the Senator will agree to it if made.

I wish to add that the rules of the other House, as I understand them, make a motion to reconsider a privileged motion, and I hope the Committee on Rules will at the same time make it a privileged motion in the Senate for the reason I suggested, not applying it to the Senator from Connecticut, that one man by entering a motion to reconsider may prevent action altogether, unless it is a privileged motion, and in order to call attention to the importance of making such a motion debatable.

Both things, in my judgment, ought to be the rule of the Senate. It is a privileged motion in the other House, and it ought to be debatable, so that a Senator who makes a motion to reconsider shall have a right to give the reasons why he makes it.

It was not with any reference to the Senator from Connecticut that I spoke, for from the beginning he has expressed his desire to have the motion to reconsider acted upon, and he desired to be heard upon it, as I thought was his right.

CHEROKEE FUNDS.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday passed the bill (S. 1800) to secure to the Cherokee freedmen and others their proportion of certain proceeds of lands under the act of March 3, 1883.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

FERRY AT FORT BUFORD.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (H. R. 1280) to authorize Frank W. Hunt to erect and maintain a ferry across the Missouri River at the military reservation of Fort Buford, Dakota Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish action upon the motion now?

Mr. PLUMB. I simply wish to enter the motion at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. SAWYER. I wish to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from New Jersey is not yet in order. The morning business is not yet closed.

ACCOUNTS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby instructed to furnish the Senate any additional claims not heretofore reported for salaries of postmasters or late postmasters that have been adjusted under the act of March 3, 1883.

Mr. CHACE. I offer a resolution directed to the Postmaster-General, and it is in terms the same resolution as the one offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] yesterday, changed, however, to cover all the States. That Senator withdrew the resolution after having offered it because the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] stated that he had already offered and procured the passage of a similar resolution, and that the Postmaster-General had refused to respond to the resolution on the ground that it would require a very large clerical force—in effect that the Department would be physically unable to respond to it.

I have reason to believe, as the Senator from Kansas said, that that view can not be maintained by the Postmaster-General, that these accounts are adjusted, and that it is simply a matter of making a transcript from the books of the Department.

I wish to say further that from correspondence put into my possession between certain claim agents in this city and claimants under the law of 1883, the evidence points very strongly to the suspicion that there may possibly be some collusion between parties in the Post-Office Department and certain claim agents in this city, one individual in particular, who assumes to put himself above not only the Department, but above Congress itself, and to dictate to claimants what they shall do and what proportion they shall share with him. He even goes so far as to give his own name to an act passed by the Congress of the United States.

I wish to say that in my opinion the Postmaster-General owes it to himself and to the Department to take such prompt action in regard to the adjustment of these salaries as shall purge the Department from this grave suspicion that rests upon it. It is a shame; it is a disgrace. I do not mean to charge (I can not charge because I am not prepared to prove) that anybody in that Department is guilty; but I do say that the circumstances point to a very grave suspicion, and for that reason I offer the resolution.

There ought to be no necessity for any claim agent to intervene between a citizen of the United States who has been an official and who has a claim against the Department. Such claims ought to be adjusted by the Department and reported to Congress promptly, and we should then appropriate the money to pay them, and the claims should be paid promptly.

Mr. HAWLEY. Without commission.

Mr. CHACE. Without commission; and no claim agent should be put into a position where he can say to any claimant, "Stand and deliver!"

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island, as he has stated——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island offers a resolution, which will be read; and then the Senator from Delaware will be recognized.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the amount of additional compensation ascertained to be due postmasters and late postmasters under the act of March 3, 1883, for the payment of which no provision has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution is before the Senate, and the question is on its adoption.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no objection to the resolution, but the Senator from Rhode Island has stated that there is reason for grave suspicion that persons connected with the Post-Office Department, especially one person, are in collusion with claim agents.

Mr. CHACE. Will the Senator excuse me? I did not say that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I certainly misunderstood the Senator then; and I was going to say that it would be but just to those who are not liable to such suspicion that the name of the party to whom the Senator refers should be made known.

Mr. CHACE. I have no objection to naming him. It is one Spalding. He assumes to attach his own name to an act of Congress, and calls it the Spalding act, prints it in circulars, and sends it all over the country, calling it the Spalding act, and even goes so far as to print the fact alleged by him that he got the law through.

Mr. BUTLER. This question has been frequently before the Senate, not only under the present administration but under the preceding one, when similar resolutions were offered. I think it is due to the Department, not only as at present administered but as administered by the predecessor of the present Postmaster-General, to say that they have "in season and out of season," upon all occasions where they could properly do so, notified these claimants that they are under no obligations whatever to pay any proportion of the money to any claim agent. I know that to be a fact, because there were quite a number from my State and they have written to me repeatedly about it.

Why there is this delay I confess I can not understand, but I do not think Mr. Spalding has any better standing in the Post-Office Department than he has with the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHACE. If the Senator will allow me right there, I wish to say that perhaps my language may have been a little stronger than the circumstances would warrant; but these accounts under the law should have been long ago adjusted.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the Senator about that entirely.

Mr. CHACE. They are not adjusted, and in numerous instances when applications have been made simply a partial adjustment has been made. It is not that there is any direct evidence, but the facts as they exist create in the minds of persons ignorant of how such things are done a suspicion. I do not mean to say, nor do I mean to insinuate, that I think any one in the Department is guilty of this collusion, but I do say that the manner in which the business is, I will not say done, but neglected to be done, leaves them open to that charge.

Mr. BUTLER. I quite appreciate all that the Senator from Rhode Island has said. After having had some correspondence and communication with the Department on this very subject, I felt justified in stating that claimants have been notified again and again, as I stated before, that they are under no obligation whatever to pay Mr. Spalding one dollar. There is nothing that I know of which can prevent his communicating and corresponding with various claimants, as he is constantly doing, sending his circulars and requesting them to send to their Representatives and Senators——

Mr. CHACE. Allow me to interrupt the Senator there. There is something which can be done, and that is the prompt adjustment of these accounts.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, but I say there is nothing that can be done which will prevent Mr. Spalding corresponding with claimants.

Mr. CHACE. Oh, no.

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the Senator that a prompt adjustment of the claims would soon end the whole matter, and I think it ought to be done promptly. I have no hesitation in saying so, and I said so under the former administration. What the particular trouble is, I confess I myself do not understand.

Mr. CHACE. Nobody can deny that former administrations and this stand in the same position. I did not mean to draw any distinction.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. MAXEY. I know a great deal about the trouble to which the Senator from Rhode Island refers. The bill was in my charge in the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. After a very thorough investigation I became satisfied that a great many postmasters in the United States were entitled to a readjustment of their accounts fairly and honestly. I know that at that time, which was under a Republican administration, the then controlling powers were disinclined to favor the measure. They thought it would cost a very large amount of money and involve a vast deal of trouble. I replied that it made to me no difference how much it would cost; if the claim was honest it ought to be paid I then believed so; and I now believe so.

So far as Mr. Spalding or Mr. Anybodyelse is concerned, it never had the slightest influence on the committee on this earth. I have received letters not only from my own State but from many portions of the country on the subject. As I happened to be connected with the passage of the bill persons wrote to me wanting the bill passed, and I think there has been, to say the least of it, a delay in the Post-Office Department not only in the last administration but in the present administration that I can not account for. These men ought to have had their money years ago, and I say now that whatever can be done to aid in the prompt adjudication and just settlement of these claims and the payment of the claims ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

J. H. THORNBURG.

Mr. PLUMB. I introduce a bill, which I ask the Senate to consider now.

The bill (S. 2692) to amend an act approved June 1, 1886, granting a pension to J. H. Thornburg was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLUMB. On the 1st day of June the bill was approved by the President, which had passed both Houses of Congress, granting a pension to a man named "Thornbury," as named in the bill—b-u-r-y. It turns out that it was a mistake either of the printer or the person draughting the bill or of somebody else. It should be Thornburg—b-u-r-g. I do not think that in a matter of that kind any Senator would object to passing a bill to correct the original act; and therefore I ask that the bill I have just presented for that purpose, only changing the terminal letter of this man's name who should receive the pension, may be taken up for consideration now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill now. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend and correct the act approved June 1, 1886, "granting a pension to J. H. Thornburg;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John H. Thornburg, late of Company D, Eighth Iowa Cavalry Volunteers.

And the pension is to commence from the date of the approval of the original act.

Mr. INGALLS. That original act ought to be repealed if this is to be a substitute for it, or otherwise there will be an act under which somebody will be entitled to claim.

Mr. PLUMB. I accept the suggestion and will add a section repealing the original act.

Mr. HOAR. Then the other section ought to be changed, because the first section is that that act is amended so as to read so and so, leaving the original act in force except as amended. It would strike me, therefore, that if the Senator adopts his colleague's suggestion the bill says that that act is repealed and that Thornburg be placed on the pension-roll from the time the other act, the repealed act, was approved.

Mr. PLUMB. The time is so short that I do not think that is very material.

Mr. HOAR. But the propositions seem inconsistent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that as the bill now stands it modifies the original act without making it necessary to repeal it.

Mr. PLUMB. I think amending it "so as to read as follows" is sufficient. I do not adopt my colleague's suggestion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint a board, to consist of three officers of the Army other than those now connected with the District government, to examine and report whether the present distribution of the water supply to the District of Columbia is conducted and made according to proper engineering principles; what amount of water is supplied daily for United States Government use; what amount for private use; and whether the water-tax payers of Washington are equally and fairly supplied with water, according to their locality and to the means available by the District government, and to transmit to the Senate the report of the board hereby directed to be appointed.

Mr. INGALLS. It is obvious that that is not within the competence of a Senate resolution. The duties imposed on the Secretary of War are by statute. It is not competent for the Senate by resolution to order the Secretary of War to perform a duty that would otherwise be enjoined upon him by law. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that while I have no objection to the inquiry that he desires, the resolution ought to be referred either to the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on the District of Columbia for further examination.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That resolution is precisely in the language of a resolution offered some three years ago by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN], and I think the point was not then raised upon the resolution. It went over for a day. What action was had I do not remember, but the resolution itself had the effect to accomplish a great deal of good for people who were gathering water in this city by drops; and it occurred to me that we were in that condition again where a great many of the citizens of Washington are doing that very thing now, gathering water by the teaspoonful, and that the introduction of the resolution would probably have the effect of calling the attention of the authorities to it so far that they may aid in giving to the people of the District some relief. Some relief is necessary.

Strange as it may appear, four years have elapsed since an appropriation of about $600,000 was made for the extension of the Aqueduct; and now, after time enough has passed to have built a railroad across this continent, they are asking for about the same amount to finish the extension of the Aqueduct; which means, I presume, four years more before the Aqueduct will be finished—eight years to finish what is called an extension of the Aqueduct. Why, I suppose the people of this District do not know, and the Congress of the United States do not know; but there is the fact. In winter time the water is suffered to run to waste a great deal by half the population of the city for fear of the frost bursting the pipes; and in the summer time it half runs away for another class of population who want to have fountains in their parks. Therefore it is that those who actually need, for the necessaries of life, water, are really deprived of it in the city.

I desire to do enough to call the attention of the authorities to this matter. There may be far off in the future a time when there is to be water enough in this city and the supply will be so abundant that the citizens will not have to be watching that a drop is not wasted here or there, but that seems far off yet. Four years have gone and we have an expenditure of nearly three-quarters of a million of dollars without result.

I am perfectly willing that this resolution shall be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and trust——

Mr. INGALLS. Say the Committee on Military Affairs, as it is directed to the Secretary of War.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I prefer the Committee on the District of Columbia, because they are connected with the District commissioners and the water board, and I trust at least this will have the effect which the resolution of three years ago had.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask to take up Order of Business 303, being the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has adopted a special order which requires a new mode for conducting business to-day, which will be read. Senators will please take notice of the terms of the order under which the Senate is acting to-day.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Thursday, June 17, be devoted to the Calendar under the five-minutes' limitation for debate and subject to objection, which objection shall operate only to pass over the case, retaining its place on the Calendar; and that no motion shall be made to proceed to the consideration of any bill where objection is made to the consideration of the same; and that Friday shall be devoted to the Calendar under the eighth rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Business under the eighth rule is now in order.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill I have named. I understood the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to desire to fix a day for it. I want to take up the bill in order that we may agree upon a time to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand whether the Senator from New Jersey is asking the Chair a question.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask unanimous consent to take up this bill for the purpose of naming a day which the Senator from Illinois and myself may agree on.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not see how that can well be done now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the special order, the Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 303, being the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. Is unanimous consent asked to take that up in violation of the order previously made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the only way in which it can be done, by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to take up the bill, the objection to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order under the eighth rule. No bill can be taken up on such a motion, under the eighth rule, unless it is objected to in its due order when reached.

Mr. SEWELL. We can always move to take up a bill, I understand.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Chair understand that this order continues through to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It continues through to-day. Whenever a bill is reached under the eighth rule on the Calendar, then it is in order to move to proceed to its consideration if objection be made to it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not speak in reference to this matter, which is not in my charge at all, but to another; but when the order was passed, I expressly stipulated that it should be on condition that it should be in the power of a Senator to move to proceed to consider a bill; and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said that he so understood it.

Mr. SEWELL. This case was passed over without prejudice.

Mr. INGALLS. Where does the consideration of the Calendar begin to-day under this order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At Order of Business 163. If the bill to which the Senator from New Jersey refers is on the Calendar it will be reached no doubt in a short time.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understood the understanding to be that on a motion made to-day to take up any bill on the Calendar which was passed over yesterday with a like understanding it would be in order to move its consideration notwithstanding any objection.

Mr. SEWELL. My colleague and I did not understand that the Calendar would be commenced at Order of Business 163. I withdraw my motion for the present. We shall reach the bill after a while.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar under the order will be stated.

R. 1357) authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine certain claims, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SPRINGER, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. BUCHANAN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

Order of Business 163, being the resolution submitted by Mr. PLATT declaring that executive nominations shall hereafter be considered in open session, was announced as the first business in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

ELON A. MARSH AND MINARD LAFEVER.

The bill (S. 500) for the relief of Elon A. Marsh and Minard Lafever was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to that also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

STEPHEN N. SMITH.

The bill (S. 708) for the relief of Stephen N. Smith was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

WILLIAM C. DODGE.

The bill (S. 301) for the relief of William C. Dodge was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to the consideration of that bill, but it seems to me that the blanks in it ought to be filled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are amendments reported which provide for that. The amendments will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendments reported by the Committee on Patents, which were to fill the blanks in line 6 and line 10 by inserting "ten thousand" before the word "dollars."

Mr. ALLISON. I object to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

CALIFORNIA LAND SALES.

The bill (S. 994) granting to the State of California 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of lands in said State was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

DISTRICT TAX-SALES.

The bill (S. 634) relating to sales for taxes in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported an amendment, in line 15, after the words "deed and," to strike out "such deed shall be conclusive evidence;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter sales of real estate, after advertisement as required by law, by the collector of taxes for the District of Columbia, for taxes or assessments that have been or may be levied by the commissioners of said District, or by other lawful authority, shall entitle the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, if the property be not redeemed within two years of the date of such sale, to a deed from the commissioners of the District which deed shall vest in the grantee a good and valid title, and shall be presumptive evidence in all controversies in relation thereto that the property so conveyed was subject to the taxes for which the property was sold, that such taxes were not paid, and that the property was not redeemed before the execution of the deed, that the manner of levy, notice, sale, and all the other prerequisites of law were complied with necessary and proper to make such deed and title valid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. That is a very important bill. There is a large amount of property in this District the taxes upon which I understand have been accumulating for a number of years under the former system of special assessments. I do not know how far this bill may cover such cases. As it is a very important matter, I ask the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia if the bill has been carefully considered in reference to that class of persons who have been unable to pay the large assessments made for improvements.

Mr. INGALLS. It has been very carefully considered. It was passed by the Senate at the last session. It merely provides a method by which the payment of taxes can be enforced.

There is at the present time nearly a million dollars of delinquent taxes in the District, much of which is not paid simply because people can use their money in some other way more profitable than by paying their taxes. This bill merely provides that a deed may be issued when the property is sold for taxes after the proper time for redemption has elapsed. It is a provision that exists in every other community in the Union, so far as I know. The committee have endeavored to guard it carefully. I trust that the Senator will not interpose any objection to the bill.

Mr. CALL. I do not object. I only wish to know whether there has been any provision made for that class of people who have incurred large indebtedness on their property by reason of special assessments made some years ago for improvements in the District. I wished to ascertain whether it would apply to that class of tax-payers.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I desire to say with respect to this bill, which does not entirely commend itself to my judgment, that on careful investigation of the matter I understand that unless the District commissioners can proceed in the manner provided in this bill there will be great loss to the revenues of the District. If we had pursued this policy at a much earlier date the community would have been far better off. There are taxes laid from which the District gets no benefit. I hope the bill will become a law.

Mr. CALL. My object has been accomplished; I merely wished to call attention to the fact that there were a very large number of deserving people here whose property has been virtually confiscated under the system of special assessments. There ought to be some relief for them.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT LIQUOR SALES.

The bill (S. 1380) relating to the sale of distilled and fermented liquors in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, at the end of section 2 to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, however, That where the written permission of a majority of the persons owning real estate and a majority of the residents keeping house has been secured as above required, such written permission shall hold good until the commissioners, in their discretion, shall direct the party applying for the license to again secure such written permission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF PETER DELLA TERRE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 492) for the relief of Frank Della Terre and Susan F. Della Terre, heirs of Peter Della Terre, deceased.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment, after the words "sum of," in line 6, to strike out "fifty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That out of any money in the Treasury of the United States the Secretary pay to Frank Della Terre and Susan F. Della Terre, heirs of the late district attorney of the northern district of California, Peter Della Terre, deceased, the sum of $10,000, in full consideration for extraordinary services rendered by said Peter Della Terre, during the years 1857, 1858, and 1859, in defending the title of the United States to public property in the State of California, and recovery of 19,148 square miles of territory, valued at $150,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRUSTEES OF ISAAC R. TRIMBLE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1388) for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORIDA INDIAN WAR CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 1729) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities was announced as next in order.

Mr. CALL. Let the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). The bill will be passed over on objection.

MOBILE DOCK COMPANY.

The bill (S. 300) for the relief of the Mobile Marine Dock Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois objects to the consideration of the bill. It will be passed over.

CLERK-HIRE TO POSTMASTERS.

The bill (H. R. 4415) to make the allowances for clerk-hire to postmasters of the first and second class post-offices cover the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEE ON DOMESTIC MONEY-ORDERS.

The bill (H. R. 4177) to reduce the fee on domestic money-orders for sums not exceeding $5 was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to reduce the fee for each domestic money-order not exceeding in amount $5 from 8 cents to 5 cents, the reduction to take effect within one month after the date of the approval of the act by the President.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OBSTRUCTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The bill (S. 64) to prevent the obstruction of navigable waters and to protect public works against trespass or injury was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that that bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator asks that this bill go over without prejudice, retaining its place under the eighth rule. The Chair hears no objection.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no use in reading that bill. I object to taking it up now.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator from Illinois desires to make a suggestion, I suppose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois interposes an objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from New Jersey said that when this bill was reached he would be willing to fix a day for taking it up for consideration. I am perfectly willing to do so; and if the Senate will agree to it I suggest that it be taken up next Thursday and disposed of.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senate will have to give unanimous consent to take it up and make it a continuous order so as to supersede everything else.

Mr. LOGAN. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall object to making it a continuous order.

Mr. LOGAN. We can make it a special order for Thursday and take it up and dispose of it.

Mr. SEWELL. To follow whatever the unfinished business is on that day.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to that, but if any appropriation bills are ready they should have preference.

Mr. SEWELL. Of course; everything gives way to appropriation bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will Senators state their proposition?

Mr. SEWELL. I ask unanimous consent, as the Senator from Illinois is not ready to go on with the discussion to-day, that the bill be made the special order for Thursday of next week, to follow any unfinished business coming up that day, subject of course to the appropriation bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be made the special order for Thursday next, subject only to any unfinished business on that day. If there be no objection that will be considered the order of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so made a special order.

JAPANESE WORKS OF ART.

The bill (S. 1772) providing for the purchase of the Capron collection of Japanese works of art, now on temporary deposit in the National Museum, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on the Library, March 4, 1886:

In the matter of the purchase of "the Capron collection of Japanese works of art," now on temporary deposit in the National Museum, referred by resolution of the Senate to the Committee on the Library, that committee reports a bill for the purchase of the same.

Your committee also reports the letter of Spencer F. Baird, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution and Director of the United States National Museum, together with the letter of G. Brown Goode, assistant director, on the subject of said collection.

[United States National Museum, under direction of the Smithsonian Institution.]

WASHINGTON, February 26, 1886.

SIR: I am in receipt of your communication asking my opinion as to the probable value of the Capron collection of Japanese works of art, and as to the desirability of their purchase. I have requested one of my assistants to examine the collection, and inclose herewith his report.

The Capron collection is an interesting one, and is constantly increasing in value. In fact, several of the articles included could probably not be readily obtained elsewhere. In view, therefore, of the fact that Japanese art is undergoing great deterioration and is rapidly disappearing, it would seem eminently appropriate that a collection, which is so interesting to artists and so suggestive to students of industrial art and to designers, should become the property of the Government and be displayed in the National Museum. We have already a large number of objects of a similar nature, for the most part the gift of the Japanese Government, acquired both at the time of Perry's expedition and during the past year. The Capron collection added to these would give to the National Museum a very creditable collection illustrating Japanese arts and manufactures.

I am, sir, yours, very respectfully,

SPENCER F. BAIRD,
Secretary Smithsonian Institution and Director United States National Museum.

Hon. W. J. SEWELL,
Chairman Joint Library Committee, United States Senate.

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1886.

SIR: Pursuant to your instructions, I have carefully examined the collection of Japanses works of art belonging to the estate of the late General Horace Capron, with the view of estimating its desirability for the use of the National Museum, and of forming an idea of its commercial value, and have the honor to report as follows:

The collection, in connection with similar objects already the property of the Museum, would be extremely serviceable, and I should hope that it may be possible to acquire it.

The lacquered objects are the most valable, particularly the four which bear the crest of one of the families of shoguns—the Tokagawa family, if my memory serves me right. These I estimate at $3,000. There are also about twenty pieces of smaller size, many of them of great age and fine quality. These are probably worth $1,000. Total for lacquer, $4,000.

The bronzes are forty-six in number, five being of large size. I place their value at $3,500.

There are also two pieces in silver bronze and one in gold bronze, representing birds and flowers, which I place at $1,100.

There are 37 carvings of ivory, estimated worth $700, and 10 carvings in wood, at $500.

The porcelains and enamels are worth, perhaps, $1,025. The armor, lance, and sword, $400. The large pictorial screens, albums, and scrolls, $450. This makes a total of $11,675.

There is also the collection of coins, containing 63 pieces; 35 of them are of gold, and weigh about 600 grams. I am told that an expert from New York appraised this collection as worth $5,000. I think it may safely be considered worth $3,000, although I know little or nothing of the value of Japanese coins.

The estimates thus amount to $14,675. I may add that there has been an enormous increase in the value of such objects since the collection was first deposited in the Museum, and that the figures here presented are nearly double what I should have thought it proper to submit under similar circumstances five years ago. I have not, of course, a dealer's familiarity with values, but am tolerably well acquainted with the subject under consideration, and do not believe that my estimates are too high. That they are not too low, particularly in the case of the lacquers, I am not at all positive.

Yours, very respectfully,

G. BROWN GOODE, Assistant Director.

Professor SPENCER F. BAIRD,
Director United States National Museum.

A revised descriptive catalogue of the foregoing collection is also submitted as a part of this report.

Descriptive catalogue (revised) of General Horace Capron's collection of specimens of antique Japanese works of art, temporarily deposited in the United States National Museum, Smithsonian Institution.

INTRODUCTION.

In Japan, the love of art has penetrated even to the lowest classes of the people. Their fancies, conceits, poetry, puns, legends, and mythology are all expressed in characteristic forms of art, such as are enumerated in the collection herein described. Instead of ink and paper, or paint and canvas, the artists have selected, as their mediums of expression, porcelain, lacquer-work, screens, embroidery, ivory, and ertal.

This rare and original collection was made by General Capron during a long residence in Japan, which covered a period of the greatest interest in the history of that empire, embracing as it did the closing scenes of a revolution which terminated in the abolition of the feudal system, thereby forcing the Daimios and princes of the empire to offer for sale vast treasures in the way of rare art productions of the days of Japan's greatest prosperity and unrivaled proficiency, specimens of which had been sacredly guarded for centuries. It was from such sources that this collection was taken.

The numerous legends herein recorded were gathered from the people during actual residence among them, and subsequently corrected and elaborated, reference for the purpose to Professor W. E. Griffis's works, The Mikado's Empire (Harpers, New York), Corea, the Hermit Nation (Scribner's, New York), Japanese Fairy World (J. H. Barbyte, Schenectady, N. Y.), and to Audesley and Bowers, The Keramic Art of Japan.

The greater portion of the lacquered work of the collection was taken from the private stores of the Tycoons which were confiscated at the close of their reign by the Mikado's Government. These pieces bear the armorial insignia of the princely families in which they have been treasured for centuries. Other specimens in this collection were derived from imperial sources as presents. The peculiar significance of the combinations of plants and birds in these pieces will be found in the notes appended to this catalogue.

All the articles embraced in this collection were secured before any attempt had been made to imitate these rare and unrivaled works of Old Japan and the substitution of gamboge, tinfoil, and other combinations for pure gold used in the decorations of these antiques.

The time required to produce a first-class lacquered specimen was formerly from four to six years. The longer the time given to each coating the harder and more durable it becomes. From six to eight and even twenty coats of lacquer are necessary for the best work, applied at intervals of from four to six months; hence the worthlessness of the lacquer productions of the present period.

In their keramic products likewise, especially the Satsuma faience, time or labor under the old dynasties were not considered, and during the existence of the Satsuma princes in full power the pure specimens of their potter's work, now so rare, were made without regard to cost. These were never designed to be sold, but were made to serve as presents among the princes and rulers of the empire. No such ware is made at the present time worthy the attention of foreign purchasers. The Satsuma faience in this collection was procured when the lords of Satsuma were wealthy and in the height of their power.

No. 1. The cock on the drum is often chosen by the artist in cloisonné, lacquer, porcelain, and bronze. It is a symbol of good government and a peaceful state of society. It was an ancient custom in China and Japan to station a drum on a stand in front of the magistrate's office. Any one oppressed or maltreated could come and, by beating the drum, call attention to his complaint, and receive redress. In time of misrule or public disturbance the drum would often sound, scaring away bird and beast; but when all was "peace under heaven" the drum was neglected. Years rolled by in peace and quietness; vines grew up and encircled the drum; rust corroded it, and a large piece fell from the side. The cock with his flock becoming familiar with its peaceful aspect selected it as a fit abode for his harem, and the quiet repose of the mother with her little brood as they appear in peaceful possession of the great drum is the result. By such simple means are great events remembered and ancient customs transmitted for ages.

ELABORATELY CARVED IVORIES.

No. 2. Medicine chest.

No. 3. An elaborately carved ivory cylinder, exhibiting a religious procession winding up a hill through bowers of trees and flowers.

No. 4. Cigar-case.

No. 5. Fukuroku Jin.—Fukuroku Jin is one of the seven gods of happiness, and the patron of long life and prosperity. He is represented with a cheerful countenance and long flowing beard, and is usually accompanied by a crane or stork, which is the symbol of longevity, and said to live ten thousand years. Every one likes Fukuroku Jin, and wants to get his favor and live long. Children are amused by him. He is mostly seen at weddings, with his long white hair and pleasant smile. (Jap. Fairy World, page 78.)

No. 6. Akechi.—This figure, it is believed, is intended to represent Akechi, who assassinated Nobunaga Kioto in 1558-'60. He was a stern, proud man. Not liking the familiar manner in which Nobunaga, in a merry mood, at a feast at his own castle, seized Akechi around the neck and made a drum of his head by drumming on it with a fan, he determined upon revenge. This he accomplished by surprising Nobunaga in his palace at Kioto. (The Mikado's Empire, page 231.)

No. 7. Kiyomori.—This tall figure of a warrior in a passion—in white ivory—is Kiyomori, who caused the death by assassination of Yoshitomo. In 1159 he conceived a plan for the complete extermination of the Miame tos, which was centered in the children of Tokiwa, the concubine of Yoshitomo. (The Mikado's Empire, page 121.) Tokiwa is represented in an ivory group of a mother and her three little children fleeing for safety through the snow. For the interesting history of her escape from his wrath, and the eventual restoration of her family to power, see legend attached to that group of ivory, No. 24.

No. 8. The ivory figure with goggle eyes and distorted countenance is one of the thunder-gods. They are seen standing on either side of the main entrance to Buddhist temples. They are of colossal size, and the more hideous the better.

No. 9. A beautiful carved representation of a brave man who killed a serpent which for a long time had infested his neighborhood.

No. 11. Represents a citizen of the third class in holiday dress.

No. 12. Represents a lady of the third class in holiday dress.

No. 13. Yoritomo.—This elaborate carving in ivory represents one of Japan's greatest heroes. He was of the Minamoto family, and lived in the twelfth century. Japanese history is filled with his heroic exploits. In his younger life he was a "Prince Hal," and in his after life he became a "Bluff King Harry," barring his polygamic tendencies. (Chap. xiv, The Mikado's Empire.)

No. 14. Kai Riu O.—(The god with a black ball in one hand, white in the other.)—This figure represents the god of the sea, who is in the act of raising a tempest in the sea by rolling a black ball or smoothing it down by rolling the white ball. (Japanese Fairy World, page 273.—"The Jewels of the Ebbing and the Flowing Tide.")

No. 15. Hideyoshi.—Hideyoshi, born of a peasant family in 1536, was represented as a cunning, reckless boy, at one time a "betto" (groom). He grew up a man of war and a successful soldier. He first reduced the daimios to submission, and then sent his generals Konishi and Kato Kiyomasa, to invade Corea, which he made tributary to Japan. Hideyoshi was one of Japan's ablest rulers. He died in 1598. (See "Corea, the Hermit Nation.")

No. 17. Kato Kiyomasa.—This figure is supposed to represent Kato Kiyomasa, who commanded one wing of Hideyoshi's army in the Corean expedition in the sixteenth century. It was he that instigated the cutting off of the ears of the Coreans killed in battle. The ears of ten thousand Coreans killed in one battle were cut off and preserved in salt, or sake, and carried back to Japan. In the city of Kioto stands to this day a barrow—Mimidzuka, or Ear Monument—under which are entombed the ears of the ten thousand Corean warriors. (The Mikado's Empire, page 245.)

No. 18 represents an ancient warrior in full armor. Japanese armor is made of steel and lacquered paper laced with silk cords.

No. 19. Lu Wen, the Japanese Rip Van Winkle.—This woodman, one day, shouldered his own ax and started for the woods to procure his winter's supply of fuel, but was beguiled by a large fox a long distance up the mountain, when suddenly he came upon two beautiful ladies seated upon the ground playing checkers. Lu Wen stopped and wondered, but the ladies took no notice of him, continuing their game, not even asking him to play with them. At last Lu Wen bethought himself of his home and family, and the necessity for his preparation of his winter's wood. Turning back, he went off down the mountain, but his cabin was gone! The venerable rocks were there, but a strange people surrounded them; the children mocked, the dogs barked at him; no one knew him and he knew no one. His long white beard swept the ground and his strange appearance excited wonder. At last he was met by a venerable lady, who, taking compassion upon him, informed him that away back in the history of her family there was a man lived in that neighborhood by the name of Lu Wen, but that was six generations back, and no one ever knew what became of him, so poor Lu Wen hobbled up the mountain side, and was never heard of after. (The Mikado's Empire, page 503.)

No. 20. Hotei, the Japanese Santa Claus.—Hotei is one of the seven patrons of happiness. He is as round as a pudding, and as fat as if rolled out of dough. He is a jolly vagabond, but a great friend of the children, who romp over him, standing upon his knees, and hanging around his shoulders, pulling his hair and his long ears. He always has something good for them, which he carries in a sack, which he partially opens that they may see what it contains, but suddenly closes it before they have fairly ascertained its contents. By and by, if the children are good, he opens it. (Japanese Fairy World, page 83.)

No. 21. Daikoku.—Another of the seven patrons is a short, chubby fellow, with eyes half sunk into his fat face, but winking with fun. He has a cap set on his head, a long sack over his shoulders, his throne is two straw bags of rice, and his badge a small hammer or mallet, with which he makes people rich when he shakes it at them. He has long-lopped ears.

No. 22. Raiko and the Dragon.—Raiko was famous for his prowess in arms, and deified because of his having killed the great ghoul with three eyes, and the Dojl, or giant-boy demon who ate up young girls. (Japanese Fairy World, page 191.)

No. 23. This exquisitely-wrought ivory figure represents a Japanese fisherman returning from the scene of his daily labor, bearing his little child upon his shoulders holding a fish. It is a beautiful illustration of a Japanese's love for his children. To fully appreciate the delicacy of the carving in this as in all the other pieces in this collection, it should be examined under a magnifying glass.

No. 24. This group represents Tokiwa. Tokiwa was a young peasant girl of superior beauty, whom Yoshitomo made his concubine, and who bore him three children. She fled to escape the minions of Taira after the death of her lord in 1159, who was assassinated in a bath by three hired assassins at Utsumi, in Owari. Tokiwa's flight was in winter, and snow lay upon the ground. She knew neither where to go nor how to subsist; but clasping her babe to her bosom, her two little sons on her right, one holding his mother's hand, the other carrying his father's sword, they trudged on, nearly frozen and half starved. She was met in her flight by a Taira soldier, who, pitying her and her children, gave her shelter and protection, supplying her and her children from his own meager rations. Her husband's great enemy, Kiyomori, was anxious to overtake her, and, believing that her filial affection for her mother would cause her to yield herself up, had seized upon her. Tokiwa heard of her mother's durance at Kioto. Then came the struggle between maternal and filial love. To enter Kioto she feared would be the death of her children, but for the salvation of her mother, a sentiment so strong with the Japanese, she was influenced to take her course into the city, and to trust to her beauty and accomplishments to melt the heart of Kiyomori. Thus she saved the lives of her mother and children. The babe at the breast was the future Yoshitsune, a name which at this period awakens in the breast of a Japanese youth emotions that kindle his enthusiasm to emulate a character that was the mirror of chivalry, valor, and knightly conduct. He was the Chevalier Bayard of Japan. The oldest son, who is represented in the group carrying his father's sword, became a noted warrior. (The Mikado's Empire, page 124.)

No. 25. This figure, a companion to No. 23, is another specimen of skill of the highest order in this art of carving in ivory, and should be examined under a high magnifying power.

No. 26. A mail-clad warrior of the sixteenth century.

No. 27. A Japanese water-carrier.

No. 28. A street juggler, with his boy acrobat.

No. 29. Peasant girl and child.

No. 30. The children's friend and adviser.

No. 31. An exquisite carving, representing three field-mice.

No. 32. One of the gods possessing power to control wild beasts.

No. 33. Fukuroku Jin, mounted on a horse. (See legend attached to No. 5.)

No. 34. Benton, Queen of the World under the Sea.—Legend. In the sixth century there lived upon the coast of Tango a poor fisherman and his wife. Their only means of subsistence was the fish caught from the sea by their only son, Taro by name. One day in autumn Taro was out as usual in his boat. The sea was rough and the waves high. He uttered a prayer to the sea-god Kai Riu O. Suddenly there appeared upon the crest of the waves a divine being, robed in white, riding upon a large tortoise. Approaching the wearied fisherman, he greeted him kindly, and invited the poor fisherman to follow him and he would make him a happy man. Taro, mounting the tortoise, sped away with marvelous celerity. The wonderful sights he witnessed in the realms below the sea it would take pages to describe—splendid palaces, richly-dressed ladies with retinues of pages, waiting to welcome him; music, feasts, flowers, songs, and dances; rich jewels and precious gems, dazzling to behold. Amidst this splendor he spent most happily (what he supposed to be) seven days, when he bethought himself of his parents, whom he felt it was wrong to leave so long without their usual supply of food. He determined to return to them. The queen allowed his request; he was escorted to the white marble gate of the palace, and mounting the same tortoise, soon reached the spot which he had left in his boat. The mountains and rocks were familiar to him, but no trace of his parents' hut was to be seen. All was changed. He made inquiries of an old gray-headed fisherman, who informed him that centuries before the persons he described had lived there, and had been buried long years ago, pointing out the place of their interment. He thought their names could be read upon some of the very old tombstones, if the moss and lichens which completely hid them, could be removed. Thither Taro hied, and, after a long search, found the tomb of his parents. A cold shiver ran through him; his teeth, one by one, dropped from his mouth; his limbs stiffened, and his face wrinkled. The weight of four centuries was upon him—he died. The fishermen in various parts of Japan worship the memory of this good boy, Taro, who, even in the palace of the sea gods, forgot not his old parents. (The Mikado's Empire, page 498.) In those days, the jelly-fish—which is now a simple lump of jelly as white and as helpless as a pudding—was a lordly fellow, who waited upon the Queen of the World under the Sea, and right proud he was of his office. He would get his back up and keep it up high when he wished. He was on good terms with the king's dragon, which often allowed him to play with his scaly tail, and never hurt him in the least. But, alas! by betraying the queen's confidence on a certain occasion he was condemned to lose his shell, and was afterward to float helplessly and ashamed. Their children also were ever to be soft and defenseless. Banished from the queen's province, the jelly-fish blushed in confusion, and squeezing himself out of his shell he swam out of sight. (Japanese Fairy World, page 141.)

No. 35. Carpenter with his adze.

No. 36. Old man and boy sheltered from the storm by a palm.

No. 37. Daikoku (a small ivory figure with a dragon on its back).—A long while ago, when the Japanese first became Buddhists, they continued to burn incense to Daikoku, because he was the patron of wealth. The Buddhist idols took exception to this, and determined to get rid of him. They sent a dragon to destroy him, but Daikoku clung fast to his money-bags, and only laughed at the dragon and all efforts to destroy him. At last he shook him off, and sent him away howling.

The dragon.—Chief among the ideal creatures of Japan is the dragon. It is seen carved upon the tombs, on the temples, dwellings, and shops. It appears upon the government documents, on their paper money, stamped upon their coins, carved in bronze, in wood, in ivory, and glares upon you from their pictures. There are many kinds of dragons, such as the violet, the green, the red, the white, the black, and the flying dragon. Some are scaly, some horned, all hideous—the more so the better. When the white dragon breathes, the breath of his lungs goes into the earth and turns to gold. When the violet dragon spits, his spittle becomes balls of pure crystal. One delights to kill human beings. One causes floods and storms. The fire dragon is only 7 feet long, but its body is all flame. (The Mikado's Empire, page 478.)

No. 38. Finely wrought group representing the goat-tamer with his little boy.

In Case No. 87 will also be found a choice collection of small but rare specimens of carving in bronze. They are all antiques. They are numbered from 39 to 67, inclusive.

These exquisite specimens of the carver's art are called Netsuke. They are all drilled with two holes in the back, through which silken cords (holding pipe, tobacco pouch, and the smoker's outfit) are run; and the ivory button thrust through the girdle holds the smoker's kit easily. In every sense these ivory toggles are fine illustrations of Japanese decorative art.

No. 68. A case containing a collection of Japanese coins. These were secured only after several years' persevering labor. No attempts at preserving the coins of the country had been made, and those were found here and there among the old curio-hunters, assisted by the obliging managers of the Oriental Bank, and Mitsui, the great Japanese banker. Some date from the sixteenth century, others from the fourteenth, and exhibit the early attempts of the Japanese to convert their bullion into convenient forms for circulation, and show their gradual advancement to the beautiful milled coinage of the present day.

Nos. 72 and 73 are two albums, bearing the Tycoon's crest. They were taken from his private collection. They were originally intended for the preservation of autograph verses of their most renowned poets, of which some twenty or more specimens are inserted in the Japanese Hiragana. The reverse pages have been utilized by the collector for many excellent photographs made by Japanese during 1874, the photographic art then having been only a few years known there. They embrace various scenes, such as the most famous shrines, temples, and parks.

Case 86. In the western division of this case will be found a variety of specimens of Japanese work in bronze and in lacquer, all of which are the productions of the most renowned artists of Old Japan, such as Goro Saburo, of Kioto.

No. 76 is a delicately executed carving in bronze, representing an eagle upon a rock surprised by a serpent crawling from under his perch. Nothing can excel this specimen, either in the workmanship or the expression with which the artist has inspired his work.

No. 77. A beautifully enameled holder for a Japanese pencil or brush-pen.

No. 78. An oval vase, carved in a most elaborate manner to represent a religious procession winding around an eminence. Pilgrimages to famous sacred mountains are considered very meritorious acts among the Japanese.

No. 79. This piece is wrought out of the root of a shrub, and represents birds treed by dogs. This is an artistic delineation of a peculiar tendency of the Japanese to study nature in all its forms, and to work into a significant shape every old stump or root, which, in their imagination, resembles a living form of man or beast.

No. 80. One of the seven patrons of husbandry, mounted upon a mythical animal resembling a reindeer. It is in gold bronze, and is a most spirited piece. He is supposed to be on an errand of mercy.

No. 81. Bamboo cigar-holder.

No. 82. A beautiful chow-chow box. A chow-chow box is a convenient arrangement for serving up for a guest a meal of several courses. It is generally made of wood or papier-maché, finely laid on lacquer. It is divided into sections (in this case four) held in place by a conveniently arranged handle. This serves not only to keep the contents warm but to keep them from slopping over. One of these is placed before each guest as they are seated upon the matted floor, and a pretty Japanese maiden is always in attendance kneeling, ready to replenish the food when required One of these sections may contain fish, another rice, another soup from the seaweed, and a fourth the vegetable daikon, or colossal silver radish, which comprises the principal menu of the Japanese.

No. 83. A large scarf-box of pure gold lacquer, from the Tycoon's collection.

No. 84. Gold-lacquered tray.

No. 85. A gold-lacquered hibachi (the hibachi, or fire-brazier).—"The hibachi, or fire-brazier," says Professor Griffis, "is to the Japanese household what the hearth or fire-place is in an occidental home; around it friends meet; the family gathers; parents consult; children play; the cat purrs, and the little folks listen to fairy legends of household lore from nurse and grandma." The hibachi is always found in a Japanese house in some form; often in bronze, carved into fantastic shapes. It is an indispensable requisite, and constant one to light the pipe; for the Japanese of both sexes and of all ages and conditions smoke. Time is allowed for every laborer in the progress of his daily employment to "take a smoke." The Japanese pipe which accompanies the hibachi is made with a tiny bowl. After long mechanical practice the nimble fingers, with automatic precision, roll up the small pellet of the gossamer-cut tobacco in size just to fit the bowl of his pipe. This he touches to the glowing coal in the ubiquitous hibachi, and after one, or, at most two, very deliberate puffs, the pipe is emptied, and a fresh pellet prepared. A native will sit by the hour, mechanically rolling up these tobacco pills, oblivious, apparently, to all surroundings, and the exactness with which he forms his pellets to fit his pipe is wonderful. A shrewd judge once discovered the thief who had stolen his gold-mounted pipe by noticing a suspected person engaged in preparing his pellets to fill his pipe. He saw him draw from its pouch his golden pipe, and commence abstractedly to roll up the globules of tobacco, when, on turning to the brazier, the mouth of the bowl downward, out rolled the pellet. It was made too small for the bowl of the pipe. Here, then, there was conclusive evidence that the pipe was not his own. (The Mikado's Empire, page 501.)

No. 86. Robe chest, formerly belonging to the Tycoon; it bears his crest of the three mallow leaves within a circle. This is one of the finest representative pieces of the work of old Japanese artists extant.

No. 87. A cabinet, in old gold lacquer, from the Tycoon's private collection.

Nos. 88 and 89. Two gold-lacquered dispatch boxes, also from the Tycoon's private stores.

No. 90. A pearl-inlaid scarf box.

No. 91. The old Tycoon's helmet case, on which is emblazoned his crest.

No. 92. A chow-chow case of less pretensions. On the eastern section of case No. 86 will be seen the following rare pieces:

Nos. 93 and 94. Two hanging tablets, originally intended for holding slips of poetry, but now, through the agency of Tiffany & Co., converted into beautiful holdings for a thermometer and a weather glass. They are very old and of pure gold lacquer.

Nos. 95 and 96 are two specimens of rare carving in wood. They are the production of an unknown age, but believed to be of the fifteenth century. These pieces, when discovered, were laid away in a family tracing far back its descent. They were looked upon as "heir-looms," but want tempted the owners to part with them. The frames to these pieces were so old as to fall off in the handling, and were newly framed since they came into the possession of the present owner.

No. 97. Cloisonne vase.—Is a splendid specimen of cloisonne work. There are few superiors.

No. 98. Another cabinet from the Tycoon's private stores. It is one of the finest specimens of old gold lacquer. It has on it the Tycoon's crest of three leaves within a circle, said to have been derived from a cake ornamented with three mallow leaves, offered in hospitality to the founder of the Tokugawa family, in the fourteenth century.

No. 99. One of the imperial presents. It is several feet in height. The base or pedestal is of pure old gold lacquer; nothing ever made of this character of work surpasses it. On the pedestal rests a richly wrought silver vase of basket-form, from which springs two branches of the Japanese plum-tree (mume), converging to form an arch; on these branches are perched two nightingales wrought in silver. This combination of the nightingale with the plum-tree is the poet's combination. It is symbolical of friendship and esteem.

No. 100. Another imperial present, equally exquisite in design and execution The base is of pure gold lacquer. On this pedestal rests a representative of a rock carved in bronze, around which are twining branches of "Paulownia Imperialis," the imperial tree of Japan. Upon the top of this rock are perched, in graceful attitude, two of the mythical "Ho-ho," or, according to Griffis,

Ho-wo. Both of these mythical birds are wrought from pure silver, and are of the highest order of Japanese art. These two pieces—Nos. 99 and 100—were selected by members of the royal household from a collection of rare productions in the possession of the ancient princes of the Empire, said to be two hundred years old.

The Japanese idea of the mythical Ho-ho (the Ho-wo, or phœnix, as seen in piece No. 100; sometimes written by the English Ho-ho).—The Ho-wo, as seen on the smaller silver (imperial presents) is a fabulous bird of Chinese mythology, whose visits upon the earth are as rare as those of the angels. It is seen sculptured upon the tombs of the Shoguns of Japan, stamped upon their paper currency, and pictured in every way. It seems to be a combination of the pheasant and peacock. According to Professor Griffis, it is described by the Chinese as follows: "The phœnix (Ho-wo, in Japan) is the essence of water. It was born in the Vermilion cave. It roosts not but upon the most beautiful trees; it eats not but of seeds of the bamboo; it drinks not but of the sweetest springs; its body is adorned with the five colors; its song contains the five notes. As it walks it looks around; as it flies, the hosts of other birds follow it. Virtue, obedience, justice, fidelity, and benevolence are symbolized in the decoration of its head, wings, body, and breast. Its appearance is waited with great eagerness, as the annunciation of some great event or the appearance of some great leader."

The Ho-wo and the Paulownia Imperialis tree are often blended as imperial emblems on the Mikado robes, curtains, &c. This tree is an emblem of rectitude. Its leaves form the imperial crest. (The Mikado's Empire, page 481.)

No. 101. The Tycoon's sword-rack in gold lacquer.

No. 102. The sword of the Tycoon.

No. 103. A specimen of Japanese carving in wood, representing a fishing junk, with crew, dog, and nets.

In the long case resting against the north wall are the following pieces:

Nos. 104 and 105 are two Japanese screens, decorated with paintings on silk, representing street scenes in the city of Tokio in the times of the Shogunate, and also Japanese annual celebrations, as, for instance, the Feast of Flags, the annual display of the Nobori. This last is explained in the following sketch:

Nobori (the paper fish).—The fifth day of the fifth month—5th of May—is celebrated in Japan as the Feast of Flags, and is the day on which is displayed the Nobori, or paper fish. It is suspended from a tall bamboo pole over every house wherein a male child has been born during the preceding year. This fish is generally of paper, but sometimes, among the wealthy, is made of silk, and graduated in size to suit the purse—in some instances 30 to 40 feet in length, generally from 6 to 10. They are formed and painted to represent the carp, which fish is selected because of its ability to swim swiftly against a rapid current and leap over waterfalls, thus symbolizing great energy of character, the ability to surmount great difficulties and eventually to achieve success. (Japanese Fairy World, p. 227.) This fish being hollow and suspended by the mouth, the wind expands the body and it floats in the air with all the grace of movement of a fish in his native element.

Screens Nos. 106 and 107. On these screens the paintings are on silk. They represent the three ruling classes in the Japanese Empire, under the dual form of government. The robes of state and the details of every article of dress in each of the three ranks, the Mikado, the Tycoon, and the Daimios, even to the color and quality of the material, as well as to form, was regulated by edict; so also was the style of dressing the hair. All were different down to the common cooly. The double eyebrow, as seen upon the forehead of the Mikado, his wife, as also that of the Tycoon's consort, indicate their direct descent from the royal family. The Tycoons themselves were not of royal descent, but as commanders-in-chief of the armies had usurped the whole power of the throne for several centuries.

Of the bronzes in this case—

No. 108 is an incense-burner in octagon shape.

No. 108½. Another small incense-burner.

No. 109. An elaborately-carved falcon, perched upon the branch of a tree, which may be used as a bouquet holder, although it was not originally intended for that. This beautiful specimen of Japanese carving in bronze will bear inspection, but to appreciate more clearly the wonderful productions during past ages of this isolated and half-civilized people it should be borne in mind that all this exquisite carving in bronze and in ivory are the results of patient hand labor, unaided by any mechanical appliances whatever. It is not infrequent that the decoration of one of these pieces has required the work of a skilled artisan for years.

No. 110 is a Japanese god upon a fish, representing the first introduction of letters to Japan. (Corea, the Hermit Nation, pages 20 and 51.)

No. 111 is a Japanese god upon a reindeer in repose.

Nos. 112 and 113. A pair of richly carved vases, 36 inches in height. They are the work of centuries back.

Nos. 114 and 115. A pair of bronze vases of the famous Zogan style of workmanship; inlaid with gold and silver; 26 inches in height.

No. 116. Jiariya (Young thunder).—A poor but brave and ambitious boy, expert swordsman, and ambitious to restore the shattered fortunes of his family, became chief of a band of robbers, who plundered many wealthy merchants, and in a short time in this way had accumulated much wealth. Jiariya, hearing of an old man that lived in a mountainous region, started out to rob him. Overtaken in a heavy storm, he took refuge in an humble house. Entering, he found a very beautiful woman, who treated him with kindness. At midnight, when all was still, he unsheathed his sword, and going noiselessly to her room, was about to strike off her head, when in a flash her body changed into a very old man, who seized the heavy steel blade and broke it in pieces as though it was a stick. Jiariya was amazed, but not frightened. "I am Senso Dojin," exclaimed the old man, "and have lived in these mountains many hundred years; but my body is a frog. I can easily put you to death, but I have another purpose." Jiariya was undaunted, and asked to be received as his pupil. The old man said to him: "Henceforth cease from robbing the poor. Take from the wicked rich and those who acquire money dishonestly and help the suffering." Thus speaking, the old man turned into a huge frog and hopped away. From that time forth the oppressed poor people rejoiced as the avaricious and extortionate money-lenders lost their treasures, while they were protected. Jiariya married a beautiful woman, and after a very eventful life, and in one of his greatest battles, he was successful in killing the great dragon coil. During the time he remained with the old man of the mountains he had learned how to govern the frog, which, at his bidding, assumed great size, so that on its back he could stand up and cross rivers. He also learned how to cause storms, control the mountain spirits, and direct the elements at will, and throughout the country was known as "Young Thunder." He was made a Daimio of Idzu, and lived for many years in the bosom of his family, engaged in the reading of books, teaching his children, cultivating flowers, and beautifying his yashiki by the introduction of rare and beautiful plants. (Japanese Fairy World, page 126.)

No. 117. Senso Dojin (legend).—When Jiariya, or Young Thunder, in his youth, became chief of a band of robbers, he started out on an expedition to rob an old man. This old man was Senso Dojin, who had lived in the mountains many hundred years. His true body, however, was that of a frog, but retained the form of a very old man. He determined to instruct Jiariya in the way of the mountain spirits, how to cause a storm of wind or rain, to make a deluge, and control the elements; also how to govern frogs, and at his bidding to assume great size. Senso Dojin then bade Jiariya depart and henceforth cease from robbing the poor, but to take from the rich, the wicked, and dishonest. Thus speaking, the old man turned into a frog and hopped away.

Nos. 132 and 133. A pair of Old Satsuma vases, 25 inches in height, of the elephant trunk pattern. This particular form of decoration was only in vogue during the seventeenth century, which indicates strictly the period of their manufacture. Nos. 134 and 135. A pair of Hizen vases, 48 inches in height. Decoration, blue and gold under a glaze. These vases are of a peculiar construction, in two perfect cylinders, one within the other. PORCELAIN.

Satsuma Faience.

The manufacture of Satsuma faience was commenced in the sixteenth century.

"The earliest reliable specimens of Satsuma pottery are of very rude manufacture, being of a dark colored clay, rudely modeled and very different from those beautiful works of a soft-tinted faience of a later period, decorated with flowers, birds, and other objects, a style more delicate and artistic than can be found throughout the entire range of keramic art outside the islands of Japan."

About the year 1597, after the Japanese had invaded Corea, Shimadzu Yoshihisa, Prince of Satsuma, who accompanied that expedition, brought with him on his return to Japan a number of Corean potters, skilled in the fabrication of porcelain, and settled them in the neighborhood of Kagoshima, in the province of Satsuma. Speedily setting to work, they experimented on the various materials obtainable in that neighborhood, and after repeated trials succeeded in producing a hard faience which is now known by the name of Satsuma ware.

The descendants of these Corean potters have ever since—up to the year 1871—been under the authority and patronage of the many generations of the Satsuma princes, whose immense wealth and influence were directed to the perfection of this work.

Shimadzu Yoshihisa had taken care to secure the best and most experienced workmen, which policy has been continuously followed by all his successors up to the time of the abolishment of the feudal system in 1871.

Since that period, deprived of the protection and support of the reigning princes of Satsuma, this work has gradually fallen away, until at the present time there is none manufactured worthy the attention of the foreign collectors. See report to the Asiatic Society, after a most careful inspection into the condition of the works in Japanese keramics.

The production of a fine crackle observable in the pure Satsuma is due to the unequal contraction which takes place between the body and the glaze, which results in the minute net-work of fine cracks. "It can be said that in the entire range of keramic art there has been no surface produced more refined or more perfectly adapted to receive the colored decoration so famous in the Satsuma faience."

The specimens of the Satsuma faience which are sometimes met with, heavily decorated with religious or heraldic designs, most probably received their finish in the Kioto school. The pure Satsuma is, in most cases, finished in floral designs in combination with birds, with occasional medallions in geometrical figures emblematical of some sentiment.

The imitation Satsuma, manufactured at Awata in Hizen, and decorated in Tokio, is easily detected, the pure Satsuma being somewhat roughly potted, and generally of a hard and rather grayish-white body, while the faience of the Awata ware is most carefully manipulated, and is of a fine, soft texture, of a warm creamy or pale yellow tint, covered with a thinner or more minute crackle glaze than that applied to the pure Satsuma. It is also more profusely decorated and heavily ornamented with storks, tortoises, dragons, and birds of various kinds in heavy imitation of gold, and enameled in gaudy tints. Samples of this class of work are illustrated in plates 38, 39, 40, and 42, of Audesly and Bowes's Keramic Art of Japan, and are very fine specimens, although not Satsuma.

The pure Satsuma is of a very light tint, ranging between grayish white and vellum, or light cream color; the imitations are mostly in a buff color or light yellow. At a very early period a black ground was resorted to, but not long followed. A few specimens of this are now in existence.

ARITA.

The ware known as Arita, Imari, Nagasaki, &c., are all manufactured in the province of Hizen, and mostly exported from Nagasaki, but little or none is manufactured in that town. The great Hizen vases, such as were exhibited at the exposition at Vienna and at Paris (specimens may be seen in the vestibule at the Corcoran Art Gallery), are made at Arita, in the province of Hizen, and are known as Hizen manufacture. Their great fault is too much crowding in the decoration and great want of taste. This style still clings to this class of keramic art.

Of the fine specimens of blue under a glaze, so much admired by connoisseurs in the pure Hizen manufacture, there are two in vases in this collection—Nos. 130, 131.

Symbolical combinations.

The combination of trees, flowers, and birds on the Japanese porcelains, screens, &c., are symbolical of some sentiment, as, for instance, the pine tree and the stork, emblems of longevity. They are seen embroidered on silk robes, and presented to newly born infants.

The willow and the swallow, the bamboo and the sparrow are indications of gentleness, and are often seen on screens and fans.

The young moon and the cuckoo, the bird as seen flying across the crescent, has a poetic reference to a renowned archer, who shot a hideous beast, having the head of a monkey and the claws of a tiger.

The Phœnix bird (Ho-wo, or Ho-ho), with the Paulownia Imperialis, as seen embroidered on the Mikado's robes, rugs, curtains, gilded screens, &c., is an emblem of rectitude. The leaves of this tree form the imperial crest.

The red maple leaves and the stag are often painted upon their screens with great effect. It signifies change, as, for instance, in the fall of the year the leaf changes to a beautiful crimson, sometimes to a brilliant maroon, and when used upon their screens and presented to another party may indicate a change of feeling or sentiment. A lover to send his once loved a sprig of this autumn maple is equivalent to giving her the mitten.

The cherry blossom and pheasant are often combined in poetry and art decorations. The beautiful feathered bird and the bloom of the Sakura tree, which is cultivated solely for its blossoms, the national flower of that beautiful land. The flowers are often as large as a rose, and the falling bloom whitens the ground.

FLOWERS, ETC., 2.

The plum (Mume) tree, joined with the nightingale, is the poet's combination. It is always admired. This beautiful flowering tree is not infrequently seen in full bloom and not a leaf visible. It bursts into clouds of fragrance and beauty in February; sometimes it may be seen in full bloom with the ground, in early morning, covered with snow.

The combination of bamboo and the sparrow or the willow with the sparrow are emblems of happiness.

The plum tree in Japan blooms in February; the cherry tree in April; the lotus in July; the chrysanthemums in August, and long into winter.

THE JISHIN UWO, OR EARTHQUAKE.

The great fish, upon whose back is supposed to rest the main portion of the Japanese Empire, is the largest of all their mythical creation. The head of the fish, it is believed, is under the most northern portion of the main island, and its tail somewhat near Tokio and Kioto, the two parts where the greatest effects of the earthquake is felt. A gentle quaver of the earth is produced when he simply bristles his spine. A severe shock indicates that the brute is on a rampage, like a wounded whale. When the great sea-dragon thrashes the ocean bottom in his wrath, the ground trembles, and rocks and houses tumble, and destruction follows. When he arches his back in his wrath, the ocean rolls, and the awful tidal wave engulfs the land, and cities and towns are swept away in interminable ruin.

Japan feels the gentle quaver when he breathes; frequently, Mr. Griffis says, about twice a month on an average. I have felt them twice in a day, and one hundred have occurred in one moon. The last great upheaval occurred in 1856, when it is claimed fifty thousand people perished in Tokio alone. Serious shocks, however, have occurred since and are frequent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES A. SIBLEY.

The bill (S. 918) for the relief of Charles A. Sibley, guardian of Lloyd M. Stevens, was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

NICHOLAS J. BIGLEY.

The bill (S. 42) for the relief of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

GEORGE W. SAULPAW.

Mr. HOAR. I am obliged to leave the Chamber for a short time to attend a committee meeting, and I should like to have unanimous consent that Order of Business 326, being the bill (S. 474) for the relief of George W. Saulpaw, may be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. I do not propose to call it up to-day, but not to have it lose its place on this Calendar if it comes up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

CINNABAR AND CLARK'S FORK RAILROAD COMPANY.

The bill (S. 980) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. VEST. I object to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. SAWYER. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is very much interested in that bill, and I ask that it be passed over without prejudice until he comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. SAWYER. Only until the Senator from South Carolina comes in.

Mr. VEST. No; I do not consent to that.

Mr. SAWYER. Then I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry. If this bill shall be considered, notwithstanding the objection, will it be considered under the eighth rule, limiting debate to five minutes?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it will ["No!" "No!"], until 2 o'clock at any rate.

Mr. HARRISON. I think where a bill is taken up on motion over an objection, the debate on it proceeds without limitation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be true, unless the rule was modified by the special order applicable to this day.

Mr. MANDERSON. My vote would depend on that ruling. I do not desire to antagonize the consideration of the bill if it can be considered without the limitation of five minutes on debate.

Mr. INGALLS. The language of the rule is:

But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter notwithstanding an objection, the foregoing provisions touching debate shall not apply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, on reflection and examining the rule, is of opinion that the special order under which the Senate is acting to-day does not abrogate the eighth rule in that respect, so that if the bill is taken up on this motion it will be open to general debate.

Mr. HARRISON. Before that motion is put I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri whether it would not be better to yield to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin, and let the bill go over without prejudice. If it is taken up and debated to-day, it will take a large part of the day.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SAWYER. I will now yield, because the Senator from South Carolina has come in.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no interest in the bill. I am simply the mouthpiece of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it go over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. What would be the effect of that?

Mr. LOGAN. It does not lose its place. It will be reached again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If passed over without prejudice it will retain its place.

Mr. INGALLS. A majority can take it up at any time they desire.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not desire to antagonize the rule agreed upon. Therefore I consent to that arrangement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice. A majority can take it up at any time.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well.

FOREST RESERVATION AT CLARK'S FORK.

The bill (S. 581) to establish a forest reservation on the headwaters of the Missouri River and the headwaters of Clark's Fork of the Columbia River was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of that bill, especially of the boundaries of this park.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no written report accompanying the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any member of the Committee on Agriculture present who has any knowledge or information in regard to this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], the chairman, who reported the bill, is absent by leave of the Senate on committee service. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not object to it, because it is probably right, but I think we should know something about the size of this reservation, and have some explanation of it. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] who introduced the bill is not present. I understand the Senator from New York will be here in a few moments.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it be passed by temporarily.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be passed by, to be called up as soon as the Senator from New York comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ERNEST H. WARDWELL.

The bill (S. 1455) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to that at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

RICHARD C. RIDGWAY AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 1839) for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. This bill has received very careful consideration, more than once as I understand by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and has been very exhaustively considered in the Committee on Claims, as is exhibited by a report made by Senator Jackson, formerly a member of this body. It is a case of very great hardship and seems to be perfectly plain, one in regard to which there can be no kind of doubt. If the Senator will look at the report he will see that the case is a perfectly clear one, and one to which there can be no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I can not understand on what theory the bill ever went to the Committee on Claims, or ever was reported by that committee. It is a matter for the consideration of the Committee on Finance. It relates to the collection of internal revenue, refunding the taxes that were paid under the excise law. Obviously it is a mistake, and it is not too late to rectify it, and I hope therefore that the motion I have made will be agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I do not know that it is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Finance Committee. It is scarcely an argument to be urged when a committee of this body having jurisdiction, and quite as capable of considering the merits of the claim as any other committee, and having given to it the most careful consideration, has reported a state of fact in regard to which if the Committee on Finance were to report adversely it would not affect the substantial force and conclusiveness of the facts contained in this report. There is a report that parties have paid under an improper construction of the law, as admitted by the Department, taxes upon spirits which were not in bond. The law is entirely plain on the subject, and is so reported by the proper officer of the Government that the tax was improperly paid—paid upon spirits which were not in bond, when the instruction of the Department had been to exact tax only on such amount of spirits as were found to be in the warehouse.

For these reasons I think the Senate ought to act on this claim, which has been pending Congress after Congress on this state of facts, after the Department has acknowledged its propriety, and there is no dispute in regard to any fact whatever. The bill simply asks that the matter be referred to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to pay such amounts as he shall ascertain were improperly exacted under that construction of the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

A division was called for.

Mr. INGALLS. In order that the absence of a quorum may not be disclosed, I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. CALL. I have a right, I believe, to move that that bill be taken up by vote of the Senate notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to make that motion.

Mr. CALL. I make that motion, then.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope it will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1839, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. CALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is absent to-day owing to the illness of his colleague [Mr. MORRILL]. I was asked to pair with him, and I agreed to do so on all questions where I thought we would differ; but on this question I am sure we would vote the same way. I therefore vote "nay."

My colleague [Mr. WHITTHORNE], who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator may vote on this question if he chooses to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I decline to vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], who is called away. I have no idea how he would vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. DOLPH (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote. I recollect that I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I vote "yea," to make a quorum.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—17.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection.

PROPERTY SEIZED IN THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a House bill on the table, which I ask to have laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1357) authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine certain claims, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. JONES of Arkansas, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon.

CARRYING OF PASSENGERS BY STEAM-VESSELS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3037) relating to the licensing of vessels engaged in towing to carry persons in addition to their crews, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MILLER, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. GORMAN.

FOREST RESERVATION AT CLARK'S FORK.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I ask that Order of Business 325, which was passed over in the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], being the bill (S. 581) to establish a forest reservation on the headwaters of the Missouri River and the headwaters of Clark's Fork of the Columbia River, be called up.

Mr. MILLER. That is a bill which passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. COCKRELL. I had the matter laid over informally until the Senator from New York could be sent for, simply to have some explanation of the area of this country and the object of the bill.

Mr. MILLER. I am not able to state at this very moment the precise area. The matter has gone out of my mind, and the papers in connection with it were sent to the other House some time ago, and I have not yet been able to have them returned, but it is precisely the same bill which passed the Senate at its last session.

The Senate will remember that the bill was introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who had charge of it at the last session, and who made a statement then which was printed in the RECORD.

I am very sure that the boundaries of the reservation and the amount of land contained in it would commend the measure to all the Senators if I were able to state the exact figures, but having sent the papers to the other House and been unable to secure their return, I am not able to give the exact data. The location is at the headwaters of the Columbia River and other streams in a mountainous region, and it is simply for the preservation of the forest in that region and for the protection of the waters of those rivers.

Mr. COCKRELL. The area is the same as was embraced in the bill passed by the Senate during the last Congress?

Mr. MILLER. Precisely the same in that respect as the bill passed at the last session.

Mr. PLUMB. I think I shall object to the bill, for the present at all events.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

REPEAL OF THE CIVIL-SERVICE LAW.

The bill (S. 839) to repeal chapter 27 of the acts of 1883, relating to civil service, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an adverse report.

Mr. HAWLEY. That bill might as well be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. VANCE. There is objection. I ask for a vote upon that question.

Mr. HAWLEY and Mr. ALLISON. Let us take the vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to the consideration of it.

Mr. HARRIS. Being objected to, it goes over.

Mr. VANCE. I move that it be taken up notwithstanding the objection. I want a vote upon it at some time.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope it will be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. VANCE. It can as well be disposed of now as at any other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 839) to repeal chapter 27 of the acts of 1883, relating to civil service.

Mr. HAWLEY. I care to make no speech upon it. There is an adverse report from the Committee on Civil Service.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAWLEY. We may as well have the yeas and nays upon it at once. I renew the motion to indefinitely postpone the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act approved January 16, 1883, entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," and all acts supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof, are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion to postpone the bill. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALDRICH responded to his name.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should have been glad to withdraw my motion of indefinite postponement and let the vote be taken squarely on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Connecticut withdraws the motion I shall take the liberty of renewing it.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us go on.

Mr. INGALLS. If I could have the opportunity I would move to lay the bill on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A response has been made. ["Object!" "Object!"]

Mr. ALLISON. Let the roll-call proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A response having been made, the roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] upon all questions to-day. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL (when Mr. HARRISON'S name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea" on this motion; but by the authority given me by my colleague the Senator from North Carolina is authorized to vote upon this bill, his own pet measure.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when Mr. WHITTHORNE'S name was called). I will announce for all to-day that my colleague [Mr. WHITTHORNE] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. I do not know how either would vote on this motion.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], but learning from his colleague that he would vote "yea," if present, I will vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is detained from the Senate by sickness. If he were here, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is absent, paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired generally with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], but understanding that he would vote "yea," if present, I shall allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MANDERSON. I announce my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I do not know how he would vote. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is absent from the city, and is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. BECK. After what the Senator from Maine has said, I ought to state that I would vote "nay" but for the fact that I am paired with his colleague [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HEARST. In the absence of my colleague [Mr. STANFORD], not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS. As there is not a quorum voting, and my vote can not change the result, to secure a quorum I record my vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Logan,	Spooner,

FRANCIS DENMEAD.

The bill (S. 766) for the relief of Francis Denmead was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend by striking out, after the word "twenty-four," in line 11, all the rest of the bill.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, after the word "twenty-four," the words: "And the same hereby are granted and conveyed to Francis Denmead, his heirs and assigns forever;" so that the bill will read:

That the United States of America hereby quitclaims and releases to Francis Denmead, his heirs and assigns, any title or interest which the said United States have, by reason of any escheat or supposed escheat, in and to the following-described real estate situate, being, and lying in the city of Washington and District of Columbia, known and designated on the public plat or plan of said city as lots numbered 1, 2, 18, 19, and 20, in square numbered 924.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT ACCOUNTS.

The bill (S. 1854) authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to credit the District of Columbia with certain moneys in lieu of investing the same in bonds was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. In connection with the bill just passed I ask to have printed in the RECORD, as matter that may be important for the House to consider in connection with the bill, a letter from the former president of the board of commissioners of the District dated March 10, 1886, a letter from the Treasurer of the United States dated April 6, 1886, and also another from the same official dated June 1, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the papers will be published in the RECORD.

The papers are as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 10, 1886.

SIR: At present by law the Treasurer of the United States is required to invest so much of the sinking fund of the District of Columbia as is not required for current interest in District bonds (United States Statutes, volume 22, page 470) and is also required by the organic act of the District to invest all money retained from District contractors in United States or District of Columbia bonds. These bonds at the present time have gone so high in price that it is necessary to pay premiums of about 19 per cent. for 3.65 bonds and 32 per cent. for the 7 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia. As these bonds mature their price will necessarily decline and the loss will be that of the United States and the District. If Congress by joint resolution should authorize the Treasurer of the United States when, in his judgment, it is for the interest of the United States or the District of Colnmbia so to do, to retain the money instead of investing it in bonds allowing 3 per cent. interest on the sums so retained, the commissioners think it would be a wise provision. The commissioners understand that this is also the opinion of the United States Treasurer, who suggests this as the simplest and best mode of securing the Government against loss. The commissioners therefore take the liberty of inclosing a form of a joint resolution by Congress to that effect and beg for it the serious attention of the committee, supposing that a joint resolution will be sufficient for the purpose and that the committee will confer with the Treasurer of the United States, whose opinion upon this point would be duly appreciated by Congress, as it is by the commissioners. Nearly three and one-half millions of the District 6 per cent. debt will mature in 1891, and this resolution if adopted will enable the Treasurer to apply the sums so retained to the payment of that debt.

Very respectfully,

J. B. EDMONDS, President.

Hon JOHN J. INGALLS,
Chairman Committee for District of Columbia,
United States Senate.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, April 6, 1886.

SIR: I notice in Senate bill No. 1854, authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to credit the District of Columbia with certain moneys, in lieu of investing the same in bonds, provision is made only for the retention in the Treasury of the amounts available for the various sinking funds and the amounts retained from District contractors. I would be glad if the bill was so amended as to include in its provisions the Metropolitan police and firemen's relief funds. Said funds are required by law to be invested in bonds, and such investment, if made in the present condition of the market, is likely to entail a loss.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer United States,
Ex officio Commissioner Sinking Fund, District of Columbia.

Hon. J. J. INGALLS,
Chairman District Columbia Committee,
United States Senate.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, June 1, 1886.

SIR: Referring to Senate bill No. 1854, authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to credit the District of Columbia with certain moneys in lieu of investing the same in bonds, the Treasurer desires to make the following statement and suggestions:

Under the provisions of the act of February 25, 1885 (District appropriation bill), the profit realized from bonds sold for account of District of Columbia contractors now amounts to $22,424.85, which is to be credited to the United States and District of Columbia in equal parts.

The Treasurer still holds, for account of contractors—

District of Columbia 3.65 per cent. bonds	$72,000
District of Columbia 5 per cent. bonds	27,000
United States 4½ per cent. bonds	100
United States 4 per cent. bonds	46,000
	145,100

These bonds were purchased at a cost aggregating $166,000. The Treasurer is of the opinion that the present high rate at which these bonds are held in the market is but temporary, and it would be advisable to sell them now and realize the profit which would amount to over $9,000, paying the contractor 3 per cent. per annum on the retained amount under the provisions of the pending bill. A reinvestment could be made whenever the bonds could be purchased at prices which would seem to justify it.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer United States,
Ex officio Commissioner Sinking Fund, District of Columbia.

Hon. J. J. INGALLS,
Chairman District Columbia Committee,
United States Senate.

LOTTERY ADVERTISEMENTS.

The bill (S. 1072) to prevent the publication of lottery advertisements, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask to have the first part of the bill read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be unlawful within any district, Territory, reservation, or other place over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction for any person knowingly to publish, &c.

Mr. GEORGE. That will do.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not wish to take any time in discussing the bill. I will only state that this bill originated with the commissioners of the District of Columbia. It was suggested by them and a draught of the bill furnished, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and reported. I hope it will pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DRAWBACK ON IMPORTED TOBACCO.

The bill (S. 477) to allow drawback on imported materials used in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, and cigars exported from the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. That is adversely reported. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

INSPECTORS OF TOBACCO AND CIGARS.

The bill (S. 476) to repeal section 3151 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning inspectors of tobacco and cigars, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. That is in the same position, and I make the same objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RAILROADS IN THE HANDS OF RECEIVERS.

The bill (S. 870) to provide that where any railroad property is taken into the possession of any United States court, and such railroad shall not have been completed, the net earnings of said railroad shall be applied to the completion of the same, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

HEIRS OF JOHN W. JUDSON.

Judson, formerly of said Oswego, and to John A. Judson, of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, Ellen H. Judson, of said Oswego, and William P. Judson, of said Oswego, the children and heirs at law of said John W. Judson, and all being of full age, the sum of $1,114.67, in full settlement for the services rendered by said John W. Judson as agent for public works on Lake Ontario, in said State of New York; and the said sum of $1,114.67 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUGUSTUS J. CASSARD.

The joint resolution (S. R. 56) authorizing Augustus J. Cassard to accept a gold medal conferred upon him by the Government of France was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize Augustus J. Cassard to accept a gold medal of the first class which has been conferred upon him by the French Government for valuable services rendered to that government in the years 1880 and 1881 while consul at Tampico.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MATHILDA VICTOR.

The bill (S. 975) for the relief of Mathilda Victor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment, in line 4, after the words "sum of," to strike out "thirty" and insert "ten;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Mathilda Victor the sum of $10,000, for services rendered to the United States in the years 1862, 1863, and 1864 of the war for the Union, by the surrender of her home and property, an institution devoted exclusively to educational and charitable purposes, in Baton Rouge, La., for the use and occupation of United States soldiers as a hospital, as a depot for quartermaster and commissary stores, as quarters for cavalry troops and horses, and for other purposes; and the amount hereby allowed is in full of all demands of said Mathilda Victor against the United States on account of said services rendered, and is appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS TO MINOR CHILDREN.

The bill (S. 1948) increasing the rate of pension to minor children, and extending the pensionable period therefor, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the pensions of all minor children, and of all widows which are increased on account of minor children at the rate of $2 per month by existing laws, shall be increased on account of each child, hereafter, to $4 per month, in lieu of $2; and the period of minority during which such payment shall be made shall be extended to eighteen years, instead of sixteen years, as now provided by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in line 4, after the word "amended" to strike out "and re-enacted;" in line 10, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "one dollar" and insert "fifty cents;" in line 15, after the word "bidder," to insert:

And it is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster-General to advertise for bids at the proper time in advance of the lettings, and to enter into contracts for the performance of such service, subject to the provisions of this act.

In line 30, before the word "all," to strike out "and;" and in line 33, after the word "rates," to insert:

And if there shall be a disagreement as to what rates are reasonable, the same shall be determined by two impartial appraisers, one to be appointed by each of said parties, with power in said appraisers to choose a third if they fail to agree.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4009 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"SEC. 4009. For transporting the mails of the United States between any port of the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the Atlantic and ports in the Pacific, touching at any foreign port, there may be allowed a sum not exceeding 50 cents per mile, on the trip each way, of actual nautical miles traveled between terminal points, for each trip actually made; but such service shall be performed only under contract entered into by the Postmaster-General, after legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder; and it is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster-General to advertise for bids at the proper time in advance of the lettings, and to enter into contracts for the performance of such service, subject to the provisions of this act; and the aggregate amount to be expended for such service shall not exceed the gross revenues of the Post-Office Department of the United States on mail-matter sent to and received from foreign countries during the fiscal year next preceding the year in which such contracts are made, less the amount paid for transportation on foreign vessels, and the net amount paid foreign administrations for intermediary, territorial, and sea transit of such mails. The ships with which such contracts shall be made shall be ships of American registry only, and contracts shall be for a term of not more than four years; and the general laws regulating the transportation of inland mails shall be applicable to such contracts, except as herein provided. All vessels engaged in such contracts shall in time of war be subject to purchase or charter by the United States at reasonable rates; and if there shall be a disagreement as to what rates are reasonable, the same shall be determined by two impartial appraisers, one to be appointed by each of said parties, with power in said appraisers to choose a third if they fail to agree; and all foreign vessels or sailing vessels carrying the mails of the United States may be allowed a sum not exceeding the sea-postage now allowed by law."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOURTH BRIGADE, SOUTH CAROLINA TROOPS.

The bill (S. 582) for the relief of the board of field officers of the Fourth Brigade of South Carolina Volunteer State Troops was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Claims reported the bill with amendments: in line 3, after the word "shall," to insert "notwithstanding the bar prescribed by any statute of limitation;" in line 9, after the word "them," to insert "prior to the 21st of July, 1874, and subsequent to July 1, 1868;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Court of Claims shall, notwithstanding the bar prescribed by any statute of limitation, hear, determine, and adjudge any claim or claims of the board of field officers of the Fourth Brigade of South Carolina Volunteer State Troops, a municipal corporation of the State of South Carolina, against the United States, for the rent due by them or for the use and occupation by them, prior to the 21st of July, 1874, and subsequent to July 1, 1868, of certain buildings on Citadel Green, in the city of Charleston, after the legal termination of the late war; and that any judgment in favor of the claimant rendered hereunder be paid as other judgments of the said court are paid.

Mr. LOGAN. Is there a report with that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GRAY March 29, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 582) for the relief of the board of field officers of the Fourth Brigade of South Carolina Volunteer State Troops, submit the following report:

This claim was prosecuted and heard before the Court of Claims upon petition filed July 21, 1880, and the court made therein the following findings as to the facts:

"I. The board of field officers of the Fourth Brigade of South Carolina Militia was a perpetual corporation, created by the State of South Carolina in 1809. The said corporation was vested with power to purchase and hold land not exceeding 300 acres for the use of the militia in the parishes of Saint Philip and Saint Michael's.

"On the 25th May, 1835, the said corporation became the owners by purchase of a parcel of land, with the building thereon, on Citadel Green, in the city of Charleston, known as the Picquet guard-house, and on the 1st August, 1856, of another parcel of land, with a building thereon, known as the Boylston House, in the city of Charleston.

"II. When the rebellion broke out the confederate forces took possession of the premises, and continued their occupancy for war purposes until they evacuated Charleston in February, 1865. The United States troops then took possession of the premises and turned them over to the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands. In October, 1865, that bureau surrendered them to the city of Charleston, and Charleston in turn delivered them to the claimant.

"Whether the officers of the claimant consented to the occupancy of the premises by the confederate forces does not appear. They were themselves actively engaged in the rebellion.

"III. August 20, 1867, the United States forces again took possession of the Picquet guard-house and of the Boylston House, and occupied the former until November 1, 1874, and the latter until April 1, 1879.

"For this occupancy the United States paid rent to the city of Charleston until July 1, 1868; for the Picquet guard-house at the rate of $50 a month, and for the Boylston House at the rate of $92 a month.

"Since July 1, 1868, no rent has been paid to the claimant and no express lease appears to have been made.

"The rate of rent paid prior to July 1, 1868, would be a reasonable compensation for the use of the buildings subsequent to that date.

"IV. On the 8th June, 1877, the board of field officers of the Fourth Brigade of South Carolina Volunteer State Troops was created a corporation by the State of South Carolina and vested with the rights, franchises, and property of the board of field officers of the Fourth Brigade.

"CONCLUSION OF LAW.

"Upon the foregoing findings of facts the court decides as conclusions of law that the claimant is entitled to recover for the use and occupation of the Picquet guard-house from July 21, 1874, to November 1, 1874, at the rate of $50 a month, $166.12; for the Boylston House from July 21, 1874, to April 1, 1879, at the rate of $92 a month, $5,181.67; making in all, $5,347.79."

The court, in its opinion, says:

"We agree to the position taken by defendant's counsel that so much of the claim as originated prior to July 21, 1874, is cut off by the statute of limitations (R. S. 1069). As no time was fixed for the payment of the rent, it must be deemed to be payable as it accrued. The petition was not filed until July 21, 1880."

It having been made to appear to your committee that this claim had been presented from time to time to accounting officers and special boards charged with the settlement and adjudication of such claims from 1869 to 1879, inclusive, and that the claim had never been disallowed, but had been several times reported upon favorably, it seems to them that justice requires that the claimant should be permitted by law to present its whole claim to the court untrameled by the statute of limitations.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by inserting in the third line, between the words "shall" and "hear," the following words: "notwithstanding the bar prescribed by any statute of limitations:" and by inserting in the eighth line, between the words "them" and "of," the following words: "prior to the 21st day of July, 1874, and subsequent to July 1, 1868," and that so amended the bill do pass.

Mr. LOGAN. This report is a little obscure. Do I understand that the bill authorizes the claim from July, 1868, to 1874? Is that the idea of the bill? Or is it the intention of the bill to authorize the claimant to present a claim beginning with 1874, excluding all prior to that time?

Mr. GRAY. That is it.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I have no objection.

Mr. CONGER. The report does not speak of occupancy by the United States of the premises during this time. The claim is for that, but the report does not assert it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments proposed by the Committee on Claims, which have not been acted upon.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I ask whether in the bill there is any provision that the amount shall be in full satisfaction of any claim.

Mr. BUTLER. This only authorizes the parties to go to the Court of Claims, removing the bar of the statute of limitations. The Court of Claims will, of course, investigate the claim.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed it was an appropriation of the amount due.

Mr. LOGAN. No; it is only to go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF MICHAEL O'BRIEN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1249) for the relief of the heirs of Michael O'Brien. It provides for the issuance of a land-warrant to William O'Brien, James O'Brien, and Louisa Turnbroke, children of Michael O'Brien, deceased, late a member of the Second United States Infantry, Michael O'Brien having served in the United States Army from the year 1820 to 1838.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: I should like to ask what was done with the bill (S. 1249) for the relief of the heirs of Michael O'Brien.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider the bill is agreed to. The bill is again before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the bill. Let it go over until we can have time to discuss it.

Mr. BLAIR. What is the suggestion?

Mr. COCKRELL. We have not time to discuss the bill now.

Mr. FRYE. It has to be stated that the bill retains its place or it goes on the other Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. It makes no difference on which Calendar it stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri objects, and the bill goes over.

REAR-ADMIRAL CARTER.

The bill (S. 729) for the relief of Rear-Admiral Carter, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. Is there any report with this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator who reported it [Mr. BLACKBURN] is not present.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it go over.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that it be informally passed over until the Senator who reported it is present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that course will be pursued.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to considering the bill; but I want to say one word in reference to this remarkable proposition. Men get on the retired-list in the Army and Navy for the purpose of getting a rank they claim and which they did not have before retirement, it being understood that no extra pay was involved. This has been done in several instances. Soon afterward a bill comes into Congress asking that they be allowed back pay for a grade they did not hold. I want it understood that I shall object to this bill when it comes up, or any other like it, if I am present.

I merely make this statement to call the attention of the Senate to bills of this character which are being promoted in the Congress of the United States unjustly and unfairly. I do not know how this is, but that is the character of several of these bills which I have noticed.

CITIZENS' BANK OF LOUISIANA.

The bill (S. 709) for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to that.

Mr. GIBSON. I move that that bill be considered notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is a minority report on that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. DOLPH. It will take the rest of the day.

Mr. GIBSON. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN] on questions generally, but I do not think the pair covers this case, and I vote "yea."

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "nay," I think.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. DOLPH. I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. As I understand there is no quorum I take the liberty of voting, and vote "yea."

Mr. DOLPH. I will do the same. By arrangement with the Senator just voting, I vote "nay."

Mr. GIBSON. I should like to inquire if there is a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. GIBSON. Then I withdraw my call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the call for the yeas and nays may be withdrawn.

Mr. LOGAN. You can not do that unless the bill is passed by.

Mr. HARRIS. That will be the result of the withdrawal.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. The case is lost the way it is. I have no objection to the case being passed over.

Mr. GIBSON. Let it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to withdraw his call and that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. That course will be taken.

THEOPHILUS FISK MILLS.

The bill (S. 2023) providing for the payment of $2,500 to Theophilus Fisk Mills for executing a model and design for an equestrian statue of the late General John A. Rawlins was announced as next in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to know whether the bill provides payment for a statue that is being prepared to be put up or a model which was not accepted.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator who reported the bill [Mr. VOORHEES] is absent. He was here a few moments ago. I ask to have the bill informally passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee suggests that the bill be informally passed over.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered, no objection being made.

DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS.

The resolution submitted by Mr. VAN WYCK, March 31, 1886, "that the commissioners of the District of Columbia inform the Senate whether they are stockholders in certain corporations," &c., was announced as next in order.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I suggest that the resolution go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over without prejudice.

NORTHWEST TRADING COMPANY.

The bill (S. 1941) to enable the Northwest Trading Company, a private corporation organized under the general laws of Oregon, to purchase certain lands in the Territory of Alaska, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over. It was reported adversely.

Mr. FRYE. Can it not be acted upon adversely?

Mr. HARRIS. It can; but I thought it better to consume the time in considering favorable reports.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be acted on and indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. DOLPH. I object to the consideration of the bill under the rule. Let it go over under the ninth rule.

Mr. CONGER. We shall only have to consider it hereafter.

Mr. DOLPH. The Committee on Territories have that subject before them and may want to consider the bill hereafter.

Mr. CONGER. If there is any object in retaining the bill on the Calendar, I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

B. B. CONNOR.

The bill (S. 1537) for the relief of B. B. Connor, of Louisville, Ky., was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOLPH. There is a minority report in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon object?

Mr. DOLPH. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask to have it retain its place on the Calendar?

Mr. DOLPH. I am willing that it shall go over, retaining its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

FORT OMAHA MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 1861) to provide for the sale of the site of Fort Omaha, Nebraska, the sale or removal of the improvements thereof, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

The bill (H. R. 7479) to provide a method for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. That bill can go over. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island objects.

ARKANSAS HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 2079) to provide for the control of the reservation of public lands and the distribution of hot water, Hot Springs, Ark., was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BERRY. What Senator objected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN].

Mr. MCMILLAN. I understand that discussion of the bill would consume all of to-day and perhaps more, and there are bills on the Calendar which it is desirable to have disposed of. I think it will be an economy of time if the matter is passed over for the present.

Mr. BERRY. I do not desire to move to consider the bill this evening notwithstanding the objection if I can get unanimous consent that it may be considered at an early day. Legislation upon this subject is necessary at this session. It is an absolute necessity, as I regard it, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill be made a special order for next Wednesday at 2 o'clock. I think we can consider it in two or three hours and dispose of it, if we can take it up at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the bill be made a special order for Wednesday next at 2 o'clock.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Is that subject to the consideration of appropriation bills?

Mr. BERRY. Of course it will give way to appropriation bills.

Mr. LOGAN. I shall object to its being made a special order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to do an ungracious thing, and I am always willing to accommodate my friend, for he is very kind; but I must object to the bill being made a special order, and I will state the reason why.

Of course, without any reflection in any way, I think the bill is such a one as ought not to be enacted into a law, and for that reason, by every means I possibly can that is proper, I shall object to its becoming a law. It is, in my judgment, a bill to confiscate the property of private individuals. That is the effect of it, and I shall certainly object to it in every way I can.

Mr. BERRY. I appeal to the Senator from Illinois that he will allow the bill to come up and be discussed, and if it is not a proper bill then he will have an opportunity to amend it.

The state of affairs at the Hot Springs at this time is such that the passage of no law is worse, in my opinion, than almost any law which could be passed. I am wedded to no particular system, but the present system is unjust. It is a monopoly of that water in the hands of a few individuals. Two-thirds of the water escapes and is not being used and utilized, and hundreds of citizens there, and invalids, want to use it.

If this is not a correct bill let us pass a correct bill, and I appeal to the Senator from Illinois to give it an opportunity to be heard. He can suggest an amendment, if he thinks this is confiscating private property, and the amendment can be considered, and the whole matter will be before the Senate; but I ask him not to defeat action by objecting to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. This course does not defeat action at all. The bill is on the Calendar, and it is bound to come up again, for after this rule is exhausted then it will be open for discussion; but under the present call of the Calendar I shall certainly object to its consideration. Of course it will come up on the Calendar, and then my objection will amount to nothing; the majority of the Senate can do what they please with it, as a matter of course.

When I speak of the bill I speak of the bill in its present shape. It might perhaps be put in a shape acceptable to the body, but I speak of it in its present shape. I certainly would not vote for it in its present shape, for I consider it the confiscation of private property. I have read it carefully, and that is the way I regard it.

Of course the bill may be amended so as to be satisfactory all around. I am not objecting to a proper bill, but under the order on which we are acting now I certainly shall not agree that a bill of that character shall come up.

Mr. BERRY. The request I made was that the bill be made a special order for next Wednesday, when it can be taken up and disposed of in two or three hours, I feel very sure.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to the bill being made a special order. I will say to the Senator that a single objection can not prevent the bill from coming up hereafter, and that it will remain on the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY. We shall never reach the Calendar again this session, I fear, and the bill has been passed over three or four times. All I ask is a fair consideration of the measure, so that the whole matter may be presented to the Senate, and if it is an unjust bill, let the bill be amended so as to make it just.

Mr. LOGAN. To accommodate the Senator I will consent that the bill be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar under this order. I shall agree to that, and that will not affect its status.

Mr. BERRY. The Calendar may not be called again, and in my opinion the bill will not be reached unless it is made a special order. The Senator forces me to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill. If next Wednesday will not suit him, I ask the Senator to name a day when it can be considered, so that it can be heard again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate is by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOGAN. Because I objected to the bill the Senator regards me perhaps as the individual who is in charge of the opposition to the bill. He is mistaken in that. I merely examined the bill for the reason that at one time I was connected with the establishment of a hospital at that place and I examined very thoroughly into the laws which related thereto. When this bill came up my attention was called to it, and on reading it I regarded it as I have said.

But the Senator is mistaken if he supposes that I have any interest in guarding the Hot Springs, in any way, shape, or form, except the interest I have as a Senator in any law that may be passed where property is affected by the passage of the law.

I do not care when the bill is taken up. As I said, I shall object to its being taken up next Wednesday, because it would interfere with other matters which are on the Calendar. It is a bill which can not pass the Senate without considerable discussion; I am very sure no bill of that character could, having the provisions in it that it has. So I will say to the Senator that my objection will only tend to pass it over informally, if I may use that term, so that it will come up again on the Calendar. It may be taken up to-morrow by a majority vote.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senate will allow me, I wish to say a few words more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ought to remind the Senator that this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BERRY. I will detain the Senate but a moment I had not intended to use any language that would accuse the Senator from Illinois of being the special champion of the bath-house interests there. I did not mean that at all. I simply intended to say that whether this is a just bill or an unjust bill it is a bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands. It did not meet my views fully, but still I regarded it as better than the present condition of affairs.

As I understand it, the hot water there is monopolized by a few individuals, and two-thirds of it is allowed to escape, when it is needed for the invalids of the country. I appeal to the Senator to give an opportunity to have a hearing upon the bill, and if it is not a just bill give us one that is just, but do not defeat this proposed legislation, which is absolutely necessary for the interest of the Government, for the interest of the invalids of the country, and the interest of the people of the Hot Springs, by an objection which will result in no consideration at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas move to proceed to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will agree to let it pass over, with the understanding that if it is called again he will not object to it, then I will allow it to pass over for this evening, as there seems to be difficulty in obtaining a quorum.

Mr. LOGAN. I certainly shall not object to the consideration of the bill except under the rule on which we are proceeding.

Mr. BERRY. Then I should like to have the Senator name some time when it will suit him to have the bill made a special order.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill will come up in the natural course of business in the Senate, and I shall make no objection to its coming up legitimately and properly to be discussed, but it can not be discussed under the present rule.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Arkansas can call up the bill at any time. If he can get a majority of votes for it it can be considered at any time. It does not lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois objects to the bill, but agrees that it may retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BERRY. Very well; let it be passed over.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be passed over, holding its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the proposition which was made by the Senator from Illinois. There being no objection, that is agreed to.

PORTLAND NATIONAL BANK.

The bill (S. 84) for the relief of the First National Bank of Portland, Oreg., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, to strike out the words "eighteen thousand three hundred and ninety-nine dollars and ninety-six" and to insert "eight thousand two hundred and forty-nine dollars and twenty-three;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the First National Bank of Portland, Oreg., the sum of $8,249.23, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said sum being the amount advanced by said bank to the Oregon Iron Works, the contractor with the United States for the construction of the United States revenue-cutter called Thomas Corwin, built at Albina, Oreg., during the years 1875 and 1876, upon the security of the hypothecation of the payments to be made by the United States to said contractor, and used in the construction of said revenue-cutter, and which sum has not been paid to the said bank.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSMISSION OF WEATHER REPORTS.

The bill (S. 2004) authorizing the transmission of weather reports, storm and flood warnings, and the announcement of the approach of cold waves through the mails free of postage was announced as next in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been previously read and considered. The pending question is on an amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, after the word "reports," it is proposed to strike out the words:

Or containing warning of the approach of storms, floods, frosts, or cold waves,

So as to read:

And that all official mail matter relating to weather reports may be transmitted through the mail free of postage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kansas in my rear [Mr. PLUMB] took a deep interest in this bill when it was up before, and unless the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] who has the bill in charge will wait until he comes in, I shall ask that it go over.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to the amendment. It leaves the bill to cover the ground desired by the Department.

Mr. DAWES. What does the Senator say?

Mr. CONGER. I say, with the amendment made the bill covers what I desired to be included in the bill and what the Department desires.

Mr. DAWES. I shall object to the consideration of it until the Senator from Kansas comes in.

Mr. CONGER. Which Senator from Kansas?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kansas whose seat is behind mine [Mr. PLUMB].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to and goes over.

Mr. CONGER. I hope not.

Mr. DAWES. Let it be passed over and let us proceed to something else.

Mr. CONGER. There is no objection to the pending amendment, and the Chair was on the point of declaring that it was agreed to when the Senator from Massachusetts interposod.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that the Senator from Kansas desires to be heard, but let the Senate proceed to some other bill, and leave this stand just as it is until the Senator comes in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will be informally passed over, holding its place on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. That was done before, when it was suggested that somebody ought to be here who would like to be present.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is now here.

Mr. CONGER. The amendment was being adopted. I do not see why there should be any objection to action on the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I gave the reason which led me to object. It is a reason which governs Senators here quite often.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To which Senator from Kansas did the Senator from Massachusetts refer?

Mr. DAWES. I referred to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] offered an amendment to the bill to which there is no objection, and it was about being adopted by the Senate, and I do not suppose he asks any further time.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection personally to the bill; I do not desire to object to it; only if I were temporarily absent and a bill in which I was interested should come up I have no doubt that some one would ask that it be delayed for a few minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I will simply say in reply that the amendment which the Senator from Kansas offered has been accepted.

Mr. DAWES. I will send for the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I do not desire to obstruct the passage of the bill; I only desire the Senator from Kansas to know that it is up.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from Massachusetts did not hear me. I wish the Senator would give me his attention for a moment. If the Senator who offered the amendment is absent, and the Senate adopts his amendment, I do not think he would have any further objection to the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that he has, but I have sent for him and that will make it certain. Does the Senator have any objection to the bill being laid aside informally?

Mr. CONGER. I only want to have it considered at some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the bill will be informally laid aside.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] having entered the Chamber, I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] in line 10, after the word "reports," to strike out the words "or containing warnings of the approach of storms, floods, frosts, or cold waves."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the transmission of weather reports through the mails free of postage."

POSTAGE ON FOURTH-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

The bill (S. 1079) to regulate the rate of postage on fourth-class matter was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was reported adversely. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Having been objected to, the bill passes from the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his objection to the action on the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have withdrawn the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], who is now absent, has given notice that he desires to address the Senate upon the bill on next Wednesday.

Mr. MAXEY. Then let the bill remain on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator who reported the bill requests that it go over to the Calendar under Rule IX, where it may be discussed. Therefore I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

ESTATE OF RUDOLPH LESCHOT.

The bill (S. 2101) for the relief of Edward G. Thompson, administrator de bonis non of the estate of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] who reported the bill is absent, and it had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota objects to the consideration of the bill. Does the Senator desire to have it go over under Rule IX, or that it shall retain its place on this Calendar?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have no objection to its retaining its place.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to it. Let it go over to the other Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over under Rule IX.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The bill (S. 1884) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over under objection.

COLLISION SUITS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The bill (S. 4) to permit the owners of certain vessels, and the owners or underwriters of cargoes laden thereon, to sue the United States was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let that go over.

Mr. FRYE. Why should the bill go over?

Mr. MCMILLAN. One reason is that the Senator who made the report is absent.

Mr. FRYE. It is a very carefully drawn bill and has had the consideration of the Judiciary Committee. It is a very important measure, and I do not see any earthly objection to it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I object to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota objects.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator so object as to let it stand on this Calendar?

Mr. MAHONE. It does that anyway.

Mr. FRYE. No; it goes over to the Calendar under Rule IX under an objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not desire that the bill shall lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. Then let it be passed over informally, with the consent of the Senator.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

OPEN SESSIONS.

The resolution submitted by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER April 12, in relation to the consideration of business in open session, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HAWLEY. When my colleague [Mr. PLATT] was necessarily called away he made one special request of me. This subject having been, I will not say under his charge, but it having been one that he especially brought before the Senate, his request was that if it should come up I would ask that it might lie over until he should return. He made, as the Senate know, a speech at very considerable length, of much historical research and argument, upon the subject, and takes a very warm interest in the question. I ask therefore, or I suppose my objection is sufficient, that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). The objection of the Senator is sufficient.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask that the resolution be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the resolution being passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have not heard what the Senator said. I ask his pardon, because it was not his fault, neither was it mine.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am very sorry. I thought I spoke distinctly.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I think you did.

Mr. BUTLER. There is so much talking in the rear that nobody can hear.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. There are reasons why we did not hear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will suspend, and the Chair will have order restored in the Senate before any more business is transacted.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the order of business under consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To get the Senate in order.

Mr. HARRIS. That I understood, but I wanted to know the order of business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the order of business will be the resolution of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will now be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER April 12, 1886, as follows:

Resolved, That all matters other than those relating to treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in open session.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will not take the trouble of repeating all that I said before. The Senator from Virginia is aware of the part my colleague has taken in the discussion of this question. Therefore I feel obliged to object to the consideration of the resolution, but I ask that it be passed over, retaining its place on the present Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the resolution be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object to passing it over.

Mr. FRYE. The only way to prevent that is to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. But I do not understand yet what the position of the resolution is. The subject has been here five months; I know that, and it is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is upon the Calendar and is now laid before the Senate for its consideration and action.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is now before the Senate, as I understand, for its consideration and action, as it has been for months preceding; but the Senator from Connecticut asks that it shall be passed by informally. I have no objection to that being done, if the Senator can answer for his colleague that it can be considered within three or four days. I have let the resolution go over before, but there seems to be no end to this thing. I am ready to vote on it and let it go. Let the Senate vote on it and let it go one way or the other. If the Senator really thinks that his colleague wants to be here when the resolution is acted on and is not paired upon this question, let it go. However, I find that on most of these matters when they are brought to the attention of the Senate absent Senators are paired. Now, is the Senator from Connecticut, I mean the colleague of the Senator who is on the floor, paired on this question or is he not?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have said I desired that action upon the resolution should be delayed until my colleague returns. I suppose his general pair would cover this question. I do not know how he stands in reference to the Senator with whom he is paired, or how the other Senator stands in reference to this particular question. I objected to its present consideration and agreed to let the resolution retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It has been on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object absolutely and without condition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is passed over.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I avow that the resolution is on the Calendar and has been there for months. It has been there for five months. I deferred to the Senator from Connecticut, and it is not taken up by the favor of any Senator on the floor, and can not be objected to and passed out of sight in that way. If it is to be done, it is not to be done by a rap of the gavel. I shall ask that it be taken up by the Senate notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do, sir; and when I make the motion I wish to be allowed the privilege of stating that this is the third time I have deferred to the objection, or rather have been asked to defer to the objection, of the Senator from Connecticut on account of the absence of his colleague, and I have twice withdrawn the resolution itself in deference to one that was pending, offered by his colleague. I ask again for a vote on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Virginia moves that the resolution be taken up for consideration by the Senate notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind the Senator from Wisconsin that this is not a debatable question.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand that the question is not debatable, but I desire by the leave of the Senate simply to bring to the attention of the Senator from Virginia the fact that the other day when this matter was before the Senate the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] indicated a desire to speak upon it, and said that he was prepared to address the Senate upon it at that time. To-day he is detained from the Senate by illness, and I think under the circumstances the Senator from Virginia would hardly like to press the consideration of the resolution. The Senator from Vermont is always here when he is in health.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That is a suggestion which was not made before, and of course, if the Senator from Vermont still wants to speak on this question and is detained by illness, I will withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia withdraws his motion, and the resolution is passed over.

Mr. SPOONER. It will retain its place on the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will retain its place on the Calendar, if the Senator from Virginia does not object, in accordance with the request of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me to remark for the information of the Senator from Virginia that the resolution the Senate has already discussed on this subject is the first one on the Calendar under Rule VIII, the resolution offered by my colleague, so that there is no difficulty about the question coming up.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. MAHONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2522) to authorize the establishment of export-tobacco manufactories, and for drawback upon imported articles used in manufacturing exported tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The bill (S. 851) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been read at a former stage, and some of the amendments reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia were agreed to. The remaining amendments will be stated and acted upon.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out section 2 of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That should any part of the track extension herein authorized coincide with portions of any other duly incorporated street railway, the relative condition of the chartered rights of each may be adjusted upon terms to be mutually agreed upon between the companies, or, in case of disagreement, by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, on petition filed therein by either party, and on such notice to the other party as the court may order.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. That whenever the track extension herein authorized coincides with the route of any other duly incorporated street-railroad company, but one set of tracks shall be used by the companies in interest, which are hereby authorized and empowered to use such tracks in common upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event the said companies fail to agree upon satisfactory terms, either of said companies may apply by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall provide for proper notice to and hearing of all parties interested, and shall have power to determine the terms upon which the company herein specified shall be entitled so to use and enjoy the track of such other street-railroad company, and the amount and manner of compensation to be paid therefor.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I did not hear the reading of the bill at the time to which the President of the Senate refers, but it would seem as if this were an opportune time now to obtain some reforms in the management of the street railways in this city. A long time ago a resolution passed the Senate requiring the Committee on the District of Columbia to institute some reform.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, I can state to him that there is now pending before the District Committee a bill on the general subject in which is included the question of street railroad methods and a reform in those methods. Exactly what conclusion the committee will come to I am not prepared to say. But this bill simply extends some additional lines in the southeastern and northeastern parts of the city and in the southern part of the city near the river, to which I do not think any Senator would object understanding the exact purport and purpose of the measure.

Mr. VAN WYCK. He would probably not object to it; but it is probable, as we are approaching near the end of the session that we shall not have very much more business of this nature, and it occurred to me that it would be probably a very opportune time to put some suggestions upon this bill, so that the system which is very grievous, as the Senator no doubt well knows, shall not be continued to any greater extent in this city at least in the line extended by the Metropolitan Railroad, and that they shall be required to make their streets passable for vehicles at least on the new road which they are making.

To have a continuation of the line will certainly be desirable, and if the Committee on the District of Columbia can not reach what has been built and is done, it would seem that it would be within their province upon this bill at least to protect the citizens from any further railroads such as we have now.

It was supposed some weeks and probably months ago that some attention would be directed to that point, and the Senator now says the Committee on the District of Columbia have been considering it. Whether they will do anything or what it may be that they will do we can not of course at this time state; but the streets here are almost impassable along the line of the Metropolitan Railway. There are places on New York avenue and Connecticut avenue along the line of this road in such a condition that it would seem that some general provision should be made, some clause delegating some power somewhere. There is no power anywhere to regulate the running of these cars, the rate of speed, the motive power.

There have been a number of patriots dancing attendance upon this Congress, who have been besieging members of the Senate and I suppose of the other House. They are very anxious to establish new lines of street railway. They want to tear up some streets where there is no necessity for doing it, because they say they want a cable railway. The cable road seems to be the very thing of all others whereby the speed shall be increased and the comfort of passengers considered. It was suggested to that class of patriots that they try their hand upon the roads already here, and if the cable railway be a good thing, which I suppose it is, as there is not a question it is in my mind, to apply it, if it is a good thing, as Congress has the power, to the roads already in existence and let it be established there.

But if the committee have the time to devote and can cause an extension of these lines, it would seem as if there ought to be time enough here to make some provision as to what should be done at least upon that portion of the new line which is to be built under the provisions of this bill.

Therefore if it does not embarrass the Committee on the District of Columbia in this matter, I would very much like to have them accept an amendment to the bill that the rate of speed upon these cars shall be subject to the control and regulation of the District commissioners, that the motive power shall be subject to the regulation and control of the commissioners of the District, and that the repair of the streets shall be subject to the control and regulation of the commissioners of the District. I would offer an amendment, then, that the rate of speed on the Metropolitan Railway line shall be regulated by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and also that the motive power shall be regulated by them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Nebraska offers the amendment the Chair will state that there is an amendment pending striking out the second section of the bill and inserting. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is now in order. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. —. That the rate of speed on the Metropolitan Railway line shall be regulated by the commissioners of the District of Columbia; also that the motive power and the repair of the streets and the substitution of new rails shall be subject to the control and direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to authorizing or giving the commissioners authority to regulate the rate of speed. I think perhaps that is well enough; but in respect to the other features of the amendment, Congress has complete power over all the question. Congress can require the road to be constructed in any manner or changed in any manner that it may choose to direct; but if Congress could delegate the power to the commissioners of the District of Columbia to require the street-railroad companies to adopt engines instead of horse-power, to require them to tear up their entire plants and construct new plants upon a different method, it would be a pretty large power to lodge in the commissioners of the District. I am, for one, not ready to concede it just at this time; but if the Senator will modify his amendment, authorizing and giving the commissioners power to regulate the rate of speed, I certainly shall not object to it, though, as a member of the committee, I am not authorized to accept it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It would seem the other power proposed to be granted is as necessary and as safe certainly for the railway company. I think they will take no exception to the place where the power is proposed to be lodged. I think it has ordinarily happened that the street-railways in this city have been reasonably well, not protected I should say, but honored by having persons who are closely related with them in the board of District commissioners, so that it is not an unfriendly tribunal, and probably never can be an unfriendly tribunal from the situation of affairs.

It is the least that could be offered that the officers and friends and owners of the corporation shall be delegated with this power. I would prefer some other tribunal, but I knew very well if I suggested any other it would not probably be assented to by the committee, and I was anxious that the committee should do something toward some reform in this direction.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after that part which gives the commissioners authority to regulate the rate of speed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The amendment to the amendment is in order and will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out from the amendment the words:

Also that the motive power, and the repair of the streets, and the substitution of new rails shall be subject to the control and direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. VAN WYCK rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator from Nebraska that, having addressed the Senate once under the five-minute rule, he is not entitled to the floor again.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, this involves more than appears on the surface. It involves the question as to whether in the District of Columbia there shall be what we call in common parlance a surface track, or whether they may keep up the cobble-stone business in the middle of the streets of this city, notwithstanding the progress which is being made in all the large cities of the country, and I may say of the world.

I am not disposed to say that the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company have exerted too much influence, but it is the apprehension in the minds of some people that there would not be a railroad down Pennsylvania avenue if you required them to put down a surface track and to tear up the cobble-stones, and to take away their horses and substitute a cable. I mean to make only that expression and then to let the Senate consider it.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill does not apply to the Washington and Georgetown road at all. It applies to the Metropolitan, or what is commonly known as the F street line, that asks a few additional privileges in the way of extensions to its existing system.

Senators who are aware of the present condition of that line know that it now extends out on East Capitol street to within two blocks of Lincoln Park. One section of the bill provides that it may extend its line to Lincoln Park, and thence go south down Eleventh street east to the junction of Virginia avenue. Every property-holder in every block by which this proposed extension is to run has filed a petition with the Committee on the District of Columbia, asking that the bill may be acted on favorably.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator state when that petition was filed?

Mr. INGALLS. The bill further provides that from the P street circle up Nineteenth street to the boundary the line shall be operated a certain number of trips each hour. It provides further that from Seventeenth street down past the new State, War, and Navy Department building, where there is a portion of track that is not used at all, the line may be abandoned. It has not been used for a long time. A portion of the track is covered by the sheds of contractors engaged in putting up that building. It is necessary for the public convenience that that track should be removed and the road-way restored to its original condition, and the bill provides that that may be done and at the expense of the railroad corporation.

I believe I have expressed thus briefly all that the bill contemplates. It is for the public convenience, and so certified by those who are to be affected by it.

I would suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that while the street-car service in this city is undoubtedly in an unsatisfactory condition, while the speed is not sufficient, while the cars are antiquated and ill-kept, this is not the bill upon which to attempt to regulate that subject.

The Committee on the District of Columbia have taken a large amount of testimony under the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska. We have endeavored to formulate some system that would do away with these admitted difficulties and provide the people here with a satisfactory street-railway service; but the difficulties are so great, the evidence as to the value of conflicting systems has been so variant as between the horse and the cable system and the electric system, that while the committee have been diligent they have not yet been able to present a satisfactory solution of this whole subject. I beg to assure the Senator from Nebraska and the Senate that the committee have not been indifferent or indolent upon this subject.

I therefore hope that without attempting to burden this bill with provisions applying to this line which ought to apply to all, as the Senator himself will admit, he will permit this bill, which simply provides for an extension of the facilities of this one line through certain parts of the city that are now confessedly lacking, to pass, and leave us to deal with the other subject in a general bill that the committee have under contemplation and of the importance of which the committee are as fully aware as the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. DAWES. I objected to the consideration of this bill when it was before the Senate not long since, because I was uncertain where it was proposed to lay the additional road. Since then I have examined the map, and it seems to me to be a very desirable bill, a bill which instead of objecting to I should be very much in favor of.

I think it a good deal of an object to get up that track down Seventeenth street to the State, War, and Navy Department building, and it certainly must be very desirable to require the running of the cars from P street to the Boundary more frequently. The new road that is to be laid is in that part of the city connecting this road with a wharf at one place and with the navy-yard at another place, if I am not mistaken, but certainly they are connections which a glance at the map will show are very desirable.

That the track of this road in certain parts of the city is in very bad condition, every one will admit, and that the existing lines ought to be required to lay a different rail from what they do I think every one would be in favor of; but I hardly think it could be incorporated upon this bill with propriety.

Therefore, having objected to the bill when it was originally considered, I felt it was due to the Senate that I should do what I did, examine the map and make this statement.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The idea that I am opposed to the construction of street railways in Washington is certainly erroneous, but I do know the fact that there are propositions before the District Committee that are entirely different from what I hear stated here by the chairman of that committee, as I understood them when I was a member of it. There is a proposition, for instance, to build a cable railway, a surface track, to go down B street, to go out New Jersey avenue, and then take E street down to where it would connect with just what the Senator said was the E-street road; and then it would go out and strike Eighteenth street, and from Eighteenth street branch off and go out M street (if I am not mistaken, and I think I am not) through Georgetown, leaving then its own elbow at Eighteenth and M, going out to T street, coming back down T street to Sixth, and coming down Sixth street to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad depot, at the same time leaving its Eighteenth street elbow and coming down to what is called Water street, and going along all the wharfage of that street. Why is it that there can not be a bill here to grant that franchise, a cable road with a surface track? Instead of it, here comes in this proposition.

I say again, and I mean to repeat time and again, that it is the Washington and Georgetown Railroad corporation, not the Senate of the United States, that is controlling the District of Columbia in this matter. They dare not come in here themselves; they do not have anybody here to represent them; but they have got a cobble-stone track for horses to trot over, to pull slow coaches, stopping at the ringing of the bell by a conductor with a punch agent in the car, with people to tramp over you; and they control this whole matter, and have controlled it, in my judgment, since I have been here.

Can any Senator tell me why there should not be a bill passed to give these franchises that hurt nobody, that touch nobody, that hurt nobody's interest? We can not have it; but if you propose to tear up some of your asphalt pavement and put down some more cobblestones, so as to preserve in a way what seems to be a Washington system, you can get here a report and advocates for it. Go to Philadelphia, and you will find people there thinking the cable system and the street surface system better. Go farther, to Boston, and you will find it; and if you want to find something abroad that can possibly influence you in a matter of this sort, you will find that the English Parliament has said that there shall be no other system of street railways there. Yet here we are, having a cobble-stone system of railways in the city of Washington, forsooth because the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company have it, and they will not consent to tear it up.

I am not opposing the bill, if they would just come and say that they will construct a surface railway in this city. That is what ought to be done. It does not hurt the streets. You can walk across it, drive across it, do as you please, and you would not know there was an obstruction on the streets; but here is this system that is now held up and maintained by a corporation which seems to have more control in the District of Columbia than Congress, which seems to arrogate to itself the power to legislate for these people and for this District and for their rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I just want to say one word more and that is all. I have contended for this and I have done it because I thought it was right. Every time that you put down a cobble-stone in this city you put down a rock that is to be thrown into the very face of the men who are dealing with the profits of this street railroad company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

Mr. VAN WYCK. I propose a substitute for my amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Nebraska proposes to modify his amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I have been of course disposed to assent to the suggestions made by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and as I do not desire to embarrass them in the examination of the main question which they are now considering, I have assented to offer this as a substitute:

That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have power to regulate and control the running of cars on the Metropolitan Railroad and branches, and the rate of speed on said road and branches, and the repair of streets occupied by said road.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska modifies his amendment and the Senator from Tennessee withdraws the amendment offered by him to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the amendment be read as modified.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to insert in the amendment which I modified at the request of the Senator from Tennessee to regulate not the cable-power but the horse-power, and give them authority to regulate so that more than one little pony shall be used to draw a heavy load of passengers up these heavy grades. I have inserted it and I wish the Senator from Tennessee would consent that that should be put in.

Mr. HARRIS. I will hear the amendment read as now modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. —. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have power to regulate and control the running of cars on the Metropolitan Railroad and branches, and the rate of speed of said road and branches, and the repair of streets occupied by said road, to be done by said company.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I added that. I think it ought to be done by the company.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one other amendment reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia which has not yet been acted upon. The remaining committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That all acts authorizing the use of that portion of West Seventeenth street by said company for the operation of a street railroad south of H street be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and said company shall, within ninety days after the passage of this act, abandon the use of such portion of said street for said purpose, and restore the same to a proper condition for travel uniform with the remainder of such street; and in the event of refusal or neglect so to do within the time specified, all rights accruing to said company under this act are hereby declared to be forfeited, null, and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In section 1, line 27, after the word "act," I move to strike out all down to and including the words "by it," in line 29, in the following words:

And the said company is hereby authorized to maintain and operate all the roads and tracks heretofore laid or controlled by it.

These seem to be general words, which may have more significance than we know of at this moment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. There is no Senator on this floor who can comprehend that amendment unless perhaps it be the Senator from Iowa himself, and I will ask him to explain what its effect will be?

Mr. ALLISON. I simply move to strike out those words.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I know, but simply moving to strike out a few simple words may imply a great deal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment moved by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. J. PHILLIPS.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yesterday when the bill (H. R. 5553) for the relief of E. J. Phillips was reached, I asked that it might be passed over, the explanation not being sufficiently given by the report. I have examined the law of March 17, 1882, and I find that the Post-Office Department can only adjust claims under $2,000. I have in my hand a letter from the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department dated February 29, 1884, touching this claim and stating that it has been reported by the Post-Office Department to Congress for an appropriation, the amount being over $2,000, and that is the only reason why it has not been paid by the Department. Therefore I ask that the bill be taken up and acted upon now.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Postmaster-General to settle and adjust the accounts of E. J. Phillips, postmaster at Oberlin, Ohio, and to credit him with $2,114.89, for United States postage-stamps of the value of $1,837.64, and money-order funds amounting to $277.25, lost by a burglary, without any fault or negligence of the postmaster.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE IN THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senate yesterday passed the bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office with amendments. I wish to move that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate with a view of obtaining a conference between the two Houses on the bill and amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to request the return of the bill will be entered, if there be no objection.

OBSTRUCTIVE DEPOSITS IN NEW YORK HARBOR.

The bill (S. 2157) to prevent obstructive and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York city, by dumping or otherwise, and to punish and prevent such offenses, and making other provisions in connection therewith, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let that be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

INQUESTS UNDER NATIONAL AUTHORITY.

The bill (S. 2171) to provide for inquests under national authority was announced as next in order.

Mr. GEORGE. I object to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

ROBERT H. MONTGOMERY.

The bill (S. 1717) for the relief of Robert H. Montgomery, a captain in the Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Robert H. Montgomery, a captain in the Fifth Regiment of Cavalry, United States Army, having been a prisoner of war in the hands of the enemy during the period of time from the 19th of November, 1863, to the 16th of February, 1865, the Secretary of War is directed by the bill to correct the military record of Montgomery so that it shall appear that he served continuously in the regular Army from the 6th of August, in the year 1860.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. AKINS AND JACOB D. FELTHOUSER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over on objection.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF PETER LYLE.

The bill (S. 701) for the relief of the legal representatives of Peter Lyle, deceased, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to have the report read?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

R. D. EVANS AND R. M. GREEN.

The bill (S. 1361) for the relief of Robley D. Evans and Richard M. Green was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear enough of the report read to know whether either of these claimants was in the employment of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, April 20, 1886; but before concluding was interrupted by,

Mr. COCKRELL. I see the report states that—

Robley D. Evans was, at the time the machine was put in use, the equipment officer in charge of the equipment division of the Washington navy-yard. Richard M. Green, the other patentee, was foreman of the chain and smith shop.

Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let it be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think there is no real objection to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice.

ABEL J. LEWIS.

The bill (H. R. 6381) granting a pension to Abel J. Lewis was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] is called to this bill. There is a memorandum on it from him for it to lie over. Does he object to its consideration?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes. I think the claim has been allowed at the Pension Office. I was spoken to in regard to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

JOHN D. FINCHER.

The bill (S. 1768) granting a pension to John D. Fincher was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that that lie over. The report states that "the examining board find nothing the matter with him," and I think, in view of the fact that the examining board find that to be so, we ought not to grant a pension.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the case just passed over. I think if the Senator will read the entire paragraph from which he quoted an expression he will be satisfied to let that bill pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will examine it further to see.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, subsequently said: I understand the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to withdraw his objection to the bill (S. 1768) granting a pension to John D. Fincher.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

GEORGE S. FISHER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

SARAH E. E. PERINE.

The bill (S. 2265) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, widow and administratrix of William Perine, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that go over.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to say that there are three or four of these cases of ironclads, where there was a contract just after the beginning of the use of ironclads, all of which have passed the Senate unanimously on explanation. By the orders of the Navy Department a commission was appointed, who found that the contractors were entitled to large additional compensation. This authorizes simply the going to the Court of Claims. The Senate, on explanation, has passed two or three of these cases unanimously.

Mr. ALLISON. Is this bill reported favorably?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir; and it is included in the report of the naval commission. I am not aware that there is any real objection to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

penses incurred by it in defense of the United States was announced as next in order.

CHANGE OF INAUGURATION DAY.

The joint resolution (S. R. 55) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Under the head of "Article XVI," it is proposed to strike out:

The term of office of the President and the second session of the Fiftieth Congress shall continue until the 30th day of April in the year 1889; and the 30th of April shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th of March as the commencement of the official term of the successive Presidents, Vice-Presidents, and Congresses of the United States.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The term of office of the President and of the Fiftieth Congress shall continue until the last Tuesday of April in the year 1889, at noon. The Senators whose existing term would otherwise expire on the 4th day of March in the year 1889, or thereafter, shall continue in office until noon of the last Tuesday in April succeeding such expiration; and the last Tuesday of April, at noon, shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of the President, Vice-President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution; which, under the provisions of the Constitution, requires a two-thirds vote.

The joint resolution was passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the preamble be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

SURVEY OF HISTORIC GROUNDS, ETC.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yesterday when Order of Business 1526 on the Calendar, being Senate bill 1976, was reached I did not have the papers pertaining to it before me, and I asked that it be passed over. I now ask that that bill may be taken up. It will occupy but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1976) to provide for the survey of certain historic grounds, locations, and military marks. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be made by an officer of the Engineer Corps, in co-operation with the Maumee Valley Monumental Association, an examination and inspection of each of the following-named historic grounds, locations, and military works, to wit:

The burial place on Put-in-Bay Island of the sailors of the Navy in the war of 1812.

Fort Industry, at the mouth of Swan Creek, on the Maumee River.

Fort Miami, on the north and west side of the Maumee River, 7 miles above Fort Industry.

Fort Meigs, and the burial grounds of the soldiers of the war of 1812, near the same, on the south and east bank of the Maumee River, 10 miles above the mouth of Swan Creek.

A suitable portion of the battlefield of Fallen Timber, on the north and west bank of the Maumee River, 4 miles above Fort Meigs, where Anthony Wayne defeated the allied Indian nations under Turkey Foot, August 20, 1794.

Fort Defiance, at the confluence of the Auglaize and Maumee Rivers, erected by General Wayne in August, 1794.

Fort Wayne, at Fort Wayne, Ind., at the confluence of the Saint Joe and Saint Mary's Rivers, which was erected by General Wayne in October, 1794.

And he shall cause to be made a survey and full report to Congress of the location, situation, and condition of the same, and the amount of grounds necessary for the proper protection and improvement of the works, forts, battlefields, and burial places in and near the same, as well as the probable cost thereof; and the report shall be accompanied with the necessary maps and drawings.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $150 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the expense of the examination and inspection provided for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to the mere survey contemplated in the bill just passed. I was not present in the committee when the bill was acted on. If, however, there should come up hereafter propositions to erect monuments on all these various places, to purchase ground, and to expend hundreds of thousands of dollars upon them, I want it to be distinctly understood that the passage of this bill is no guarantee of the Senate that they will be recognized, and I for one will be opposed to them.

JUDGE FOR SOUTHERN ALABAMA.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator withdraw that for a moment? A bill was passed over yesterday of local importance that I ask the consideration of for a few minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. PUGH. It is Order of Business 1134, a House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. "A bill (H. R. 28) to provide for the appointment and compensation of a district judge for the southern district of Alabama."

Mr. KENNA. I understand an amendment which was proposed yesterday to that bill will not be offered—an amendment involving the salaries of all the district judges. With that understanding, I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] being away, I shall take advantage of his absence to observe for the information of some Senators that there is a place in this country where they appoint committees, and in that place a committee have voted to recommend the passage of this amendment, which has already passed the Senate. So I think it is better not to move it on this bill. Let it take its luck.

Mr. KENNA. In the line of the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say that there is a place in this country where all the bills that may be reported by committees are not passed; but I have no objection to this bill coming up under the understanding that the amendment referred to is not to be moved.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the motion, to allow the Senator from Alabama to have his bill passed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 28) to provide for the appointment and compensation of a district judge for the southern district of Alabama.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was, in section 1, line 6, to strike out "the same" and insert "a;" and after the word "salary," in line 7, to strike out the words "and to be paid in the same manner that the judge of the other district court of said State is allowed and paid" and insert "of $3,500, payable quarterly;" so as to make the section read:

That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a district judge for the southern judicial district of the State of Alabama; and that said judge shall be entitled to receive a yearly salary of $3,500, payable quarterly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That terms of the district court for the southern district of Alabama shall, in addition to the regular terms as now provided by law, be held on the fourth Mondays in October, February, and April in each year, for the purpose of deciding causes of admiralty and maritime jurdisdiction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 3, as follow:

SEC. 3. That the district judge for the southern district of Alabama shall reside at Mobile.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That the jurisdiction of the present district judge for the several districts of Alabama, and his successors, shall hereafter be confined to the northern and middle districts of said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to offer an amendment as a new section:

That the salary of all the district judges of the United States shall be $5,000 per annum hereafter.

Mr. KENNA. Now I appeal to the Senater from Illinois whether he will offer that amendment in face of the understanding we have had this day?

Mr. LOGAN. What understanding?

Mr. KENNA. Yesterday this bill came before the Senate subject to objection. That amendment was offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. I objected to its consideration, and on account of the absence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], by common consent it went over, I withdrawing my objection. A moment ago the bill was called up. I stated that I understood the amendment offered yesterday would be withdrawn and not insisted upon, and that being the case I would make no objection, but if that amendment was to be insisted upon I would object. Thereupon the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]—which the Senator from Illinois may not have heard—stated that because of the fact that somewhere in this country where bills were passed and committees made reports, a report had been made which met his views, therefore the amendment should not be considered here. I having withdrawn the objection with that understanding, I trust the Senator from Illinois will not press the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. You can renew the objection so far as that is concerned.

Mr. KENNA. If an objection lies as well now, I am content to renew it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator from West Virginia that I am not on the Committee on the Judiciary, but I have seen this game of shuttlecock played here long enough about the salaries of judges. I have tried for a number of years to have their salaries increased. That ought to be done and it has been agreed to time and again by one House or the other. One House agrees to it and the other House vetoes it, and there is no way to pass it except on a bill of this character, and this being a bill to appoint a judge is the only bill before Congress that I know of on which it can be put. I have no doubt the other branch of Congress will take it with this amendment. I have no right to refer to other parts of this Congress, but I may say that I see a general disposition to reduce all salaries. I do not believe in that policy. It is not economy to reduce the salaries of judges, but it is economy to increase them if they are too low and give them a decent, respectable salary. I move the amendment and shall not be deterred from doing it.

Mr. KENNA. I do not want to interfere with the passage of this original bill, but I think I am perfectly clear in the statement to the Senator from Illinois that the attaching of this amendment to the bill will not facilitate it in any way. A bill involving substantially what the Senator from Illinois now proposes has passed the Senate and gone to the House, and is subject to consideration there at the pleasure of the House. We can not by any action here properly, it seems to me, undertake to enforce an order of business elsewhere. I do not want to obstruct the passage of the original bill; I conceive it to be a bill of merit. I do not, however, want to see this proposition attached to it. I shall be obliged to object to the consideration of the whole measure unless I can object separately to this particular proposition, and if it be necessary to prevent the consideration of this proposition I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PUGH. The bill is one of great importance, and its necessity was passed upon by the Judiciary Committee, by which it was unanimously reported on the statement of the circuit and district judges and the bar that there is now practically a denial of justice in maritime cases under the present arrangement for holding courts in Alabama.

I desire to say to my friend from Illinois that I am satisfied the attempt to put his amendment on this bill will lessen the chances for passing the salary bill through the other House. It has no place on this bill. This judge is for a local jurisdiction. By this bill the new judge is to hold the court in the city of Mobile and nowhere else; and the district judge now there holds three courts in various parts of the State twice a year. His salary remains as it is unless there is a general law to increase the salaries.

I do not violate the rules of the Senate by saying that the condition of the salary bill in the House is that it has been reported favorably from the Judiciary Committee of the House. The Judiciary Committee have asked and obtained leave from the House to consider for two days bills from that committee, and I am informed by a member of the committee that this salary bill is one of the bills they intend to call up for action.

Under these circumstances it looks to me as if it would prejudice the standing of the salary bill in the House to attach it as an amendment to this bill. The amendment is out of place on this local bill; and not being unfriendly to the salary bill in the House I suggest to the Senator from Illinois to allow this local bill to go through without the amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. In response to that I will say that I certainly feel kindly to this bill. I do not know that the Senator will remember it, but I have tried for years to get an increase of salary for the judge of the northern district of Illinois, who holds court at Chicago—a man who does more work than any district judge in the United States, at a small salary; and in order to obtain that increase for him I was willing to increase the salary of all the district judges. I think they ought to have more. I am always told that if this bill passes without that amendment it will be done in the House or some other place. It has not been done, and it will not be done this session or any other. I notice the disposition in some places on other bills that I have to deal with about salaries, and I am satisfied that it will not be done. I propose for that reason, unless this amendment can go on this bill, that this bill shall not pass under this order.

Mr. PUGH. I now ask the Senator from West Virginia to allow the vote to be taken upon the amendment to this bill.

Mr. KENNA. I can not do that. Of course a majority of the Senate can do as they please.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator can make his objection afterward.

Mr. KENNA. I can not allow this amendment to go on the bill with my assent to it.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator can object to the bill after the vote on the amendment. The right to object continues up to the passage of the bill. I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I think this had better go over until morning and then let us arrange respecting it.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before putting the question on that motion the Chair will lay before the Senate as the unfinished business, in accordance with the understanding of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber-culture, the laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes.

The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

R. 8973) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, appears to have been improperly referred to the House Calendar. The Chair will order it to be placed on the Private Calendar.

PRINTING OF EULOGIES ON THE LATE JOSEPH RANKIN.

Mr. HUDD, by unanimous consent, submitted a joint resolution (H. Res. 185) providing for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Joseph Rankin; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Joseph Rankin, a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress from the State of Wisconsin, 12,500 copies; of which 3,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 9,500 for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to have printed a portrait of the said Joseph Rankin, to accompany said eulogies; and for the purpose of engraving and printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HUDD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 489) granting a pension to Mary Mortimer Semmes, widow of Commodore Alexander A. Semmes, United States Navy;

A bill (S. 686) granting a pension to Charles N. Sebastian;

A bill (S. 787) granting a pension to Ruben Farnum;

A bill (S. 1077) granting a pension to Newcomb Parker;

A bill (S. 1304) granting a pension to William Reynolds;

A bill (S. 1486) to authorize the Denison and Washita Valley Railway Company to construct and operate a railroad through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1618) granting a pension to John G. Nicholas;

A bill (S. 1797) granting a pension to John S. Kirkpatrick; and

A bill (S. 1841) granting a pension to Joseph Shull.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. 6392) with Senate amendments and recommend concurrence in certain of the amendments enumerated in the report and non-concurrence in the others.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6392) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate No. 5, in line 10; No. 6, in line 113; No. 11½, in line 526; No. 13, in line 577; No. 14, in line 654; and No. 15, in line 658.

They recommend non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 10½, 11, and 12.

The report of the committee was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to ask a conference at present?

Mr. BELMONT. Not at present.

STATUE OF LIBERTY ENLIGHTENING THE WORLD.

Mr. BELMONT. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to present a report which I send to the desk. I will ask that it be read. On the 12th of May last a message from the President of the United States urging upon Congress action in the matter of an appropriation of such sum of money as in the judgment of Congress shall be deemed adequate to defray the cost of the inauguration of the statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," presented by citizens of the French Republic to the people of the United States in commemoration of our independence as a nation, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with leave to report at any time. I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk commenced to read the report.

Mr. OATES (interrupting the reading). Is that a privileged matter?

The SPEAKER. The message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with leave to report at any time. The Clerk will continue the reading.

Mr. DUNHAM. Does that order give the right to report on private bill day?

The SPEAKER. It gives the right to report at any time. The Chair understands the report is made not for action, but for reference to the Committee on Appropriations. If there be no objection, the further reading will be dispensed with.

Mr. BELMONT. There are only a few lines more.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will a motion to allow the report to be printed in the RECORD dispense with the reading?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the right to have the report read before it is referred. The House has to act upon it.

The Clerk continued and concluded the reading of the report.

Mr. BELMONT. I ask the adoption of the report. The Committee on Foreign Affairs is of opinion that the Government is in honor bound to make provision for this inauguration, under the joint resolution of Congress of March 3, 1877, and therefore recommends that a suitable appropriation be made. The committee now asks to be discharged from the further consideration of the matter, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It is a subject which properly belongs to the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee can report an appropriation in connection with the sundry civil bill.

By a joint resolution of Congress, approved March 3, 1877, the President was authorized and directed to accept the colossal statue of Liberty Enlightening the World when presented by the citizens of the French Republic, and to designate and set apart for the erection thereof a suitable site upon either Governor's or Bedloe's Island, in the harbor of New York, and upon the completion thereof to cause the statue "to be inaugurated with such ceremonies as will serve to testify the gratitude of our people for this expressive and felicitous memorial of the sympathy of the citizens of our sister republic."

The President was further thereby "authorized to cause suitable regulations to be made for its future maintenance as a beacon, and for the permanent care and preservation thereof as a monument of art and the continued good-will of the great nation which aided us in our struggle for freedom." Thursday, the 3d of September, being the anniversary of the signing of the treaty of peace at Paris by which the independence of the United States was recognized, has been selected as an appropriate day for the ceremonies of inauguration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the committee asks to be discharged from the further consideration of the matter, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; for the reasons given in the report. I make that motion.

The question being taken, the Committee on Foreign Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the message, which, together with the report of the committee, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to introduce a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER. Is it a privileged resolution?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die at 12 o'clock m. Saturday, July 3, 1886.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HERBERT. I move to dispense with private business for to-day.

Mr. OATES. On last Friday there were two special orders postponed for final action until to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] would not interfere with those special orders which assigned two bills for consideration this morning.

Mr. OATES. Then I have no objection to my colleague's motion.

Mr. TAULBEE. Would that dispense with the call of committees for reports?

The SPEAKER. It would not, but the House of course could make another order hereafter.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HERBERT, there were—ayes 88, noes 31.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR, and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HERBERT.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I withdraw the point as to a quorum.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to, and private business was dispensed with for this day.

The SPEAKER. As has already been stated, there is an order assigning two bills for consideration immediately after the reading of the Journal this morning.

Mr. RANDALL. Must that order be executed?

The SPEAKER. It must, unless it be postponed. The Clerk will report the titles of the bill and joint resolution as to which the special order was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5194) directing the Quartermaster-General to settle with the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

Joint resolution (H. Res. 72) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company.

Mr. RICHARDSON. So far as I am concerned I am willing to let those two matters go over until next Friday after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HERBERT. I move that the order for the consideration of those two bills be postponed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], in charge of the first bill, asks that it be postponed until next Friday morning. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I object. I understand we have dispensed with the consideration of all private business for to-day.

The SPEAKER. This is a special order.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Was there a special order made in each case?

The SPEAKER. There was.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I withdraw the objection.

No further objection being made, the consideration of the bill, H. R. 5194, was postponed until next Friday after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HERBERT. I make the same motion as to the joint resolution, H. Res. 72.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution; and the Chair is under the impression that the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it. At any rate it was agreed the yeas and nays should be taken. The gentleman from Alabama moves to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution until next Friday.

Mr. OATES. It has been postponed for several weeks.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HERBERT, there were—ayes 87, noes 13.

Mr. OATES. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. OATES, and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HERBERT.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 125, noes 43.

So the consideration of the joint resolution was postponed until next Friday.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires a vote of two-thirds.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 105, noes 26.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. With the consent of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] I ask unanimous consent to make two reports from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. HERBERT. I hope that consent will be given, as the gentleman informs me that he is going away to-night.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE GRANTED TO EMPLOYÉS IN U. S. NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, from the Committee on Labor, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8819) to grant leaves of absence to employés in the United States navy-yards; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IMPORTATION OF LABOR UNDER CONTRACT.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, from the Committee on Labor, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9232) to amend an act to prohibit the importation and immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labor in the United States, its Territories, and the District of Columbia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill making appropriation for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to four hours. I know that the House is impatient to end the debate sooner, but we have not been able to effect any other agreement, and as gentlemen on both sides have consented to this limitation I hope the House will consent.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The motion of Mr. HERBERT was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I was prepared to accept this bill as one which ought to pass with very little discussion. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] insisted that the debate should be very brief. He thought that two hours would be sufficient, and then he consumed an hour and a half in discussing the matter affirmatively, suggesting to my mind that possibly it should receive a more careful examination than many of us have yet been able to give it.

I am not, perhaps, prepared just at this moment to discuss it as I would wish to do. I will therefore, if the Committee of the Whole will permit, occupy my time with some observations in reference to the address which was made the other night by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], the colleague of the chairman of the committee. That gentleman delivered an address occupying an hour and a half. Nearly every moment of his time was consumed in an assault upon the memory of the late Secretary Stanton. Apparently that speech was prepared with very great deliberation. The gentleman had taken ample time for its preparation. More than three weeks had been devoted to that purpose. He had ransacked all the authorities within his reach in order to furnish what would seem to justify the most unjustifiable assault which he made upon Mr. Stanton on the 12th of May last.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman will permit me to call his attention to the fact that my colleague who delivered the speech referred to is not at present in the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is not my fault. The gentleman's colleague was in the House ten minutes ago, and knew that I proposed to discuss this matter.

Mr. Chairman, on the day that I have named the gentleman from Alabama used the language which I shall cite. It will be remembered that at that time the Committee of the Whole was engaged in the discussion of an appropriation bill and of those paragraphs which referred to the Judge-Advocate-General's Bureau. After the debate was substantially concluded the gentleman said he desired to remind the committee of a little episode in the history of that Department, and continued:

It will be remembered at that time there was a great political quarrel between McClellan on the one side and influential officials connected with the Republican administration on the other side; and means had to be devised to strike down McClellan.

During that summer, while troubles were brewing in the Army in front of Washington, a law was enacted providing for the appointment of a Judge-Advocate-General. The idea was to appoint Joseph Holt to be Judge-Advocate-General of the Army, not, as history tells us, for the purpose of administering justice, but in order to use the intricacies of the law to strike down McClellan; and after the disasters of August, 1862, in the month of September, Joseph Holt was appointed.

The gentleman was reminded that was not history and that a charge of that kind could not be made without an attempt to vilify the memory of Abraham Lincoln. These two great men were intimately connected, and the commission of Joseph Holt was signed by Mr. Lincoln. Mr. Lincoln knew all his acts. Mr. Lincoln was conversant with the necessities of his appointment. Mr. Lincoln approved of his course in that office.

It then occurred to some of the gentlemen on the other side that it would not be wise thus wantonly to assail the memory of Mr. Lincoln through Judge-Advocate-General Holt. And the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], knowing that fact, promptly came to the relief of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], and suggested it was another person who was intended when they assailed the Judge-Advocate's Department.

Then the gentleman from Alabama shifts his ground and says:

I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin for the suggestion that the charges we make were against the arch-conspirator, Mr. Stanton [hisses on the Republican side], who sought and conspired to drag down officers of the Army who did not comport to his views or sustain the line of policy he sought to inaugurate. .

After that the gentleman concluded it was wise to shift his ground again. His charge was not broad enough for the purpose of his proof; and when he published his speech he uses this language:

I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] for the suggestion that the statements refer to the conspirator, Edwin M. Stanton [hisses on the Republican side], who sought to conspire to drag down officers of the Army who did not conform to his views or sustain the line of policy that he had inaugurated.

That was not broad enough, and so when he delivered his speech the other night (June 4) he still broadened the ground, and said the charge he had made was that Mr. Stanton had sought to conspire to drag down officers; and then in his astonishing argument he proposes to say Mr. Stanton, not as Secretary of War in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, as he originally charged, not as a member of the administration of Mr. Lincoln when he was engaged directly in trying to put down the rebellion, but at a much earlier period, when he was a member of Mr. Buchanan's cabinet, had sought to conspire against certain "officers," and among them he includes Mrs. Surratt.

He says the persons Mr. Stanton sought to drag down were Buchanan and his Cabinet, and he indulges in most laudatory commendations of these gentlemen. They were all of them, he informs us, loyal and honest men, forgetting among that number was the same Joseph Holt whom he originally says was inducted into the office of Judge-Advocate-General in order to conspire to drag down McClellan, to settle the "political quarrel then existing between McClellan and certain prominent Republicans." Think of it! The man he lauds as a loyal man, as an honorable man, as an honest man, being a party to this conspiracy to settle this political quarrel by dragging down one of the great Federal commanders!

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman introduced certain proofs, or what he denominated proofs, to sustain his position. He says Mr. Stanton conspired against Buchanan and the other members of the Cabinet, and in the line of his conspiracy divulged the secrets of the administration. And he has much to say about the dishonor involved in divulging the secrets of that Cabinet. He tells us that Mr. Wilson, in an article in the Atlantic Monthly for 1870, says "he (Stanton) put himself in communication with the Republicans in Congress and kept them well informed as to what was going on in the councils of the administration." And there he closes his quotation. If he had continued and quoted the entire sentence he would have read the words "directly relating to the dangers of the country." Stanton's solicitude was for an imperiled country, and the entire sentence shows that he limited his communications to such as were "directly relating to the dangers of the country."

But those words of limitation, so important to the real meaning of Senator Wilson, the gentleman sees fit to omit. And I here make the assertion, that in every scrap of quoted proof the gentleman has adduced he has garbled it. He has violently wrenched it from its context or omitted material parts, that had they been properly placed or fully quoted would have conveyed a different meaning. In the quotation cited the gentleman conveys the impression that Stanton, from treachery or in the wantonness of gossipping, betrayed the secrets of Mr. Buchanan's council board, while the quotation entire places him in the line of exalted patriotism, advising his copatriots as to dangers impending over their common country.

Every one of these authorities testified to the fact that Mr. Stanton's communications were confined to the immediate dangers of the country. What secrets were there, I would ask the gentleman, in the councils of that administration that might not be divulged to patriots? All that Stanton said was with reference to the imminent perils threatening the country; dangers which were then surrounding the Union.

Was it objectionable that all the world, at least that portion of the world which was loyally, zealously, and faithfully striving to protect the Union, should know of these dangers? I defy the gentleman in all of the voluminous writings to which he referred, with one solitary exception, to show that any one condemned Mr. Stanton for divulging any secrets of that administration that did not directly bear upon the then existing perils of the country. I also defy him to find in any of his authorities any single instance where Mr. Stanton had held communication with any man upon this subject except those who were loyally and faithfully striving to save the Union.

Who were the men that Stanton conspired with? Who were the men that he communicated with? They were Mr. Seward, Mr. Chase, Mr. DAWES, Mr. Howard, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Welles. That is the list of the names, and they include all that are named. What secret of that administration concerning the perils of the country ought not to have been known at that time to these men?

The gentleman quotes Montgomery Blair as among his authorities, the only one who used a harsh criticism on Mr. Stanton's conduct. He quotes Mr. Buchanan as an authority; and yet Mr. Buchanan says in one letter some time in April, 1862, in which he discusses the subject of divulging Cabinet secrets, that history presents but one case in which there is known to have been dishonor of that character, and that man was destroyed. And yet Stanton at that time was in the very height of his power, honored by all; no destruction had come to him; so that he at least could not have been the man whose conduct had become known to Mr. Buchanan in his historical reading. So it is in the second quotation the gentleman makes from Mr. Buchanan, found in a letter of a few weeks' later date, again clearly showing that Mr. Stanton was not the man who was in the mind's eye of the writer of the letter, and that Mr. Buchanan gave no such construction to Mr. Stanton's conduct as is given by the gentleman from Alabama.

The gentleman says that Mr. Howard is a witness against Stanton. Mr. Howard says, quoting the gentleman substantially, that he is satisfied that Stanton was the author of certain resolutions that were introduced in the House of Representatives on the 9th day of January, 1861. The gentleman has very much to say about these resolutions. He was careful, however, not to quote them. It may be well to give some attention to them in this connection. Mr. Howard says the "committee was raised at the request of loyal members of Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet" and that "the resolutions came from them."

The resolutions instructed the committee to inquire—

1. Whether any executive officer of the United States has been or is now treating or holding communication with any person or persons concerning the surrender of any forts or fortresses or public property of the United States; and whether any demand for such surrender has been made, when, and by whom, and what answer had been given?
2. Whether any officer of this Government has at any time entered into any pledge, agreement, or understanding with any person or persons not to send re-enforcements to the forts of the United States in the harbor of Charleston, and the particulars of such agreement, pledge, or understanding; when, where, and with whom it was made and on what consideration?
3. What demand for re-enforcements of the said forts has been made, and for what reason such re-enforcements have not been furnished?
4. Where the ships of the United States are now stationed, with what commands, and with what orders?
5. Whether the custom-house, post-office, arsenal, and other public buildings of the United States, at Charleston, have been seized and are held in possession by any person or persons, and the particulars of such seizure and possession?
6. Whether any revenue-cutter of the United States has been seized and is now held in possession by any person or persons, and the particulars thereof; and whether any efforts have been made by the head of the Treasury Department to recapture or recover possession of said vessel?

These were the resolutions concocted by these "conspirators" that the gentleman refers to as an evidence that Mr. Stanton was striving to break down his colleague in the Cabinet, Mr. Toucey. Now, gentlemen, remember that under these resolutions raising this committee there were five gentlemen appointed to constitute the committee. It was composed of Mr. DAWES, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Howard, Mr. Cochran, of New York, a Democrat, and Mr. Branch, of North Carolina, a Democrat, who was afterward killed in the confederate service. These were the men intrusted with the duty of making such inquiries as were to result in breaking a Cabinet officer, and which the gentleman says sustains his charge that Mr. Stanton was a conspirator and was trying to drag down officers of the Army in 1862! Surely all will agree that if the result of these inquiries would be to "drag down" a Cabinet officer, then I ask was it not the duty of all loyal hands to aid in dragging him down?

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman indulged in very much of eulogy in reference to Mr. Toucey. He was a "loyal, patriotic man," so the gentleman says, and that Edwin M. Stanton was trying to drag him down and dishonor him. The report of the committee referred to estalished the fact that although at that time—the latter part of January, 1861—we had thirty-eight war vessels in commission, yet there only two upon the Atlantic coast. We had twenty-eight vessels in the different navy-yards, partially dismantled, and Mr. Toucey had under his control on the 1st of January of that year $648,000 of unexpended appropriations for repairs, yet not one of these vessels was prepared for active service, justifying in the opinion of many the charge that has been made against him, that with design and purpose he scattered parts of the Navy of the United States where it might not be used against the Confederate States and left other parts in an unserviceable condition.

This same Mr. Toucey, day after day, week after week, accepted the resignations of officers who resigned, having first turned over voluntarily in many instances the property of the United States, the custodians of which they were, after all the facts were known to him. Let me call attention to a few of those cases.

RESIGNATIONS.

Lieut. J. R. Hamilton resigned December 1. His resignation reached the Department December 15, and was accepted the same day without examination or inquiry as to conduct. He immediately addressed a letter to his late brother officers advising them to resign and to bring their vessels with them to Southern ports and turn them over to the traitors already in arms. Had the Secretary declined to accept this resignation Hamilton might have been tried for this treason.

V. M. Randolph, captain, of Alabama, who had been excused from active service for two or three years on account of ill health, as stated, on the 10th of January forwarded his resignation. Before 12 o'clock noon of the 12th and before his resignation had reached Washington, and while still a captain, he appeared before the gates at the Pensacola navy-yard at the head of an insurgent force and demanded its surrender. The yard and the forces and the United States stores and all other property of vast amount was surrendered to him. The dispatch from the commandant announcing the ignominous surrender reached the Department on the evening of the 13th. The resignation of Captain Randolph reached the Department on the 14th, when, without inquiry or delay, it was immediately accepted.

Commander Ferroud, also of Alabama, was the executive officer at the Pensacola navy-yard. When the attack was made on the yard he met the assailants at the gate by previous arrangement, conducted them to the commandant, and participated in the surrender, and immediately engaged in service under the new commandant of the yard. This was while still retaining his commission. On the 13th or 15th he forwarded his resignation. It reached the Secretary on the 21st of January, seven days after official notice of his action had been received at the Department. Yet this resignation was immediately accepted without inquiry.

F. B. Renshaw, a lieutenant of the Navy, a citizen of Florida, actively engaged in the surrender. It was by his order that the flag was hauled down and degraded amidst taunts and jeers. He immediately enrolled himself under the leader of the insurgents. He continued to hold his commission until the 16th of January. His resignation reached the Secretary on the 22d, when, like the others, it was without inquiry promptly accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. As a matter of justice to the gentleman from Iowa I yield him more time.

Mr. BEACH. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will say I yield the gentleman as much time as he may desire, since the gentleman from New York wishes to be specific.

Mr. HEPBURN. The resignations of a large number of officers under the same class of circumstances, tainted with the same offense and crime, were by this officer promptly accepted. Did not that justify the suspicion on the part of loyal men at that time, surrounded as they were with recognized perils on every hand—traitors within and traitors without the Departments—did not that justify their being suspicious of a man charged with the defense in part of this Government when he would conduct himself in that way?

I submit to the gentleman that the charge he ought to have made, if he made any against Mr. Stanton, was disloyalty to party rather than disloyalty to his country. Where does duty lie under such circumstances? When, if there are such times, a man can not be true to both party and country, what does duty require at his hands? If there was treachery, which I deny, it was toward a disloyal party, but there was nothing but loyalty toward the Constitution that he had taken an oath to support and the lawful and patriotic purposes of his chief. There was no oath binding him to support the machinations of the men who were trying to destroy the Government.

There was an oath registered requiring him to be loyal and true to his Government.

And is it not true that the assaults that have fallen upon Mr. Stanton had their origin in a bitter disappointment that he did not lend his powerful aid to the purposes of those who opposed the suppression of the rebellion? He had been "a pro-slavery Democrat," the gentleman informs us, and doubtless all such expected that Stanton by easy stages would find himself in the disloyal camp. And when his sturdy blows fell thick and fast upon them there was no limit to their hate and rage.

The course that Mr. Stanton pursued, in my humble judgment, and it seems to me that ought to be the judgment of all loyal men, was the course that an honorable man ought to pursue. Mr. Stanton, the gentleman says, sought to drag down McClellan. That is the original charge. I assert there is absolutely no proof of that. Mr. Stanton was at all times the friend and the supporter of General McClellan until in his judgment he had shown the country that he was incapacitated for the duty that was required at his hands. While a great organizer, while a soldier of the highest merit in many respects, he demonstrated his incapacity, so it was believed, to handle large forces in the field and to fight them. Mr. Stanton was capable of recognizing this fact, and knowing how much depended on his capacity to so handle the Army, knowing what results would follow incapacity, he was prompt to say a change of commanders was necessary when he was fully satisfied this incapacity was proven. But there was no "dragging down;" there was no "conspiracy." Mr. Stanton of all men was open in all his doings with all other men. Stanton's opinions in that period were known all through the country as perhaps those of no other equally distinguished man in the country were known. He was one of all others who made no concealment with regard to his opinions upon the subject of the conduct of the war. Those who are familiar with the current literature of that day know that I am but stating the facts with regard to this matter. What Mr. Stanton thought upon public questions was publicly stated, and very early after the mooted incapacity of the general it was known what he thought and that he was in favor of a change of commanders.

With reference to his conduct in the Surratt case, the gentleman from Alabama at this late day, without knowing any of the facts—it being impossible for him to have known them at the time—gratuitously states that Mrs. Surratt was an innocent woman and that she was unjustly condemned. I do not care to enter into that discussion. The gentleman charges that Mr. Stanton, as a part of a conspiracy, withheld from the President of the United States the important fact that the court condemning Mrs. Surratt had asked executive clemency for her benefit. He quotes then the President's statement in proof, yet there are two gentlemen who say it is not true, Mr. Stanton and Judge Holt.

Judge Holt, whom the gentleman from Alabama indorses so enthusiastically as an honest and honorable man, gives a direct denial to the statement of suppression. All the facts known to any one concerning the trial and the findings of the court were laid before the President, and if the President did not know (as he later may have said he did not) that the court had asked clemency at his hands, it was his own fault and not the fault of the men whom it is the purpose of the gentleman from Alabama to deride and malign.

The gentleman tells us that while this "conspiracy," dark and deep and damnable, was going on (the one against Buchanan and his Cabinet) on the side of the loyal men of this country, there was no conspiracy upon the other side; that upon the part of Southern men all was open and above-board—honorable and high-minded. Again, the gentleman has failed to read the history of his times. Why, Mr. Chairman, a gentleman then holding a seat in Congress from his own State, Alabama, gave as a reason for coming to Washington in December, 1860, that by so doing he could tie the hands of the Government and allow the rebellion to assail it. The gentleman ought to know something of the history of his own State and of its public men, yet he seems not to know that this Representative of that State himself averred that his sole object in coming here as an officer of this Government, charged with defending the Constitution and the country against its enemies, was to tie the hands of the Government so that it could not prepare to defend itself.

The Senators from the gentleman's own State, and from five or six other States in the South, advised their constituents as follows. I read from a letter dated January 7, 1861, and written from Washington:

MY DEAR SIR: On the other side is a copy of resolutions adopted at a consultation of the Senators from the seceding States, in which Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, Mississippi, and Florida were present. The idea of the meeting was that the States should go out at once, and provide for the early organization of the confederate government not later than the 15th of February. This time is allowed to enable Louisiana and Texas to participate.

It seemed to be the opinion that if we left here force, loan, and other volunteer bills might be passed, which would put Mr. Lincoln in immediate condition for war; whereas by remaining in our places until the 4th of March it is thought we can keep the hands of Mr. Buchanan tied and disable the Republicans from effecting any legislation which will strengthen the hands of the incoming administration.

The resolutions will be sent by the delegation to the president of the convention. I have not been able to find Mr. Mallory [his Senatorial colleague] this morning. I have thought it best, therefore, to send you this copy of the resolutions.

In haste, yours,

D. L. YULEE.

JOSEPH FINEGAN, Esq.,
Tallahassee, Fla.

There is patriotism for you! There is honor for you! There is high-mindedness and purity and singleness of purpose! These gentlemen, coming here to the United States Senate with their oaths to support the Constitution fresh upon their lips, with the duty imposed upon them of doing all in their power to sustain the life of the nation, avowing that they retained their seats in the United States Senate and kept up the seeming of citizens and Senators of the United States in order that they might "tie the hands" of their Government and thwart its efforts to sustain itself.

In order that they might permit the Treasury still to be bankrupted, the Army still to be unrecruited, the Navy still to be scattered to the four winds of heaven, they boldly avowed to their co-conspirators that duty to the confederacy required of them dishonor and treason of this character to the Government they had sworn to support. And these are the men that the gentleman from Alabama eulogizes, while Stanton is the object of all his vituperative calumny!

The resolutions referred to in this letter are as follows:

Resolved, That in our opinion each of the Southern States should, as soon as may be, secede from the Union.

These gentlemen were at this time engaged, as Senators of the United States, in advising certain States to secede—pushing them out of the Union.

Resolved, That provision should be made for a convention to organize a confederacy of the seceding States; the convention to meet not later than the 15th of February next at the city of Montgomery, in the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That in view of the hostile legislation that is threatened against the seceding States, and which may be consummated before the 4th of March, we ask instructions whether the delegates are to remain in Congress until that date for the purpose of defeating such legislation.

Resolved, That a committee be, and are hereby appointed, consisting of Messrs. Davis, Slidell, and Mallory, to carry out the purpose of this meeting.

Those gentlemen were Senators from States not then seceded. No State action at that time had even assumed to change their relations to the United States. Whatever secession and rebellion might have pretended to accomplish at a later time in the way of absolving them from oaths and from the obligations of loyalty and duty, at this time, the 5th of January, 1861, there was no pretense that their States were out of the Federal Union.

Remember, that was a secret meeting, held in the night—the gentleman will be sorry to hear that—in the night of the 5th of January.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama has very much to say in criticism of other people, of those of whom he must have known but little. The value of criticism depends much upon the opportunities of he who criticises to form a correct judgment, and upon the character and temper of the critic. Who is the gentleman that so harshly criticises Mr. Stanton? He was a cadet at the Military Academy. He was for five years fed and clothed by the bounty of the Government? He was there under an agreement signed by himself, with the consent of his parents, that he would remain in the military service for eight years.

Mr. WHEELER. Unless sooner discharged.

Mr. HEPBURN. He was there under an oath that he would support the Constitution of the United States, that he would bear true allegiance to the Government of the United States, that he would defend this Government against all its enemies, all—foreign enemies and domestic enemies were all included in the ample obligation of this solemn oath. How did the critic of Mr. Stanton demean himself?

On a day in June, 1859, he was given his commission and renewed the oath which five years earlier, as a youth, he had taken to support the Constitution, to bear true allegiance to the United States, and to defend it against all its enemies. Yet early in 1861, before he had rendered a day of service, save in the peaceful occupation of a secure camp, he tenders his resignation and urges its acceptance. One copy of that resignation he sends by mail; and, for fear it may not go with sufficient directness and certainty, he sends another by Adams Express Company, urging that he be at once discharged.

I will do the gentleman the credit to say that so far as I know no hostile overt act which would bring him within the limits prohibited by the Army Regulations was committed by him until after the acceptance of that resignation. But there is something said in the Army Regulations about the dishonor of resigning a commission in the face of the enemy. I commend the study of that article to the gentleman. It will be better employment than digging among musty records in efforts to find something that may smirch the fame of a patriot.

Mr. Chairman, I take it that this labored assault on Mr. Stanton would not have been made if there had not been a seeming necessity plainly apparent to the gentleman. A convention is approaching in which he is interested. The gentleman has political aspirations in his State. He is entitled to them. His scholarship, his merits, his exalted position on this floor and in the country wherever he is known place each of the positions of honor within the limits of the proper ambition of that gentleman.

Entering the military service of the confederacy in April, 1861, he had reached in less than three years the exalted position of a lieutenant-general in its armies. As he tells us himself in the Directory, he had frequently been intrusted with the command of all the cavalry, all the infantry, all the artillery, in many important engagements. He occupies an important position in his State and he speaks for many people. But a little while ago none too partial friends were presenting him as the person to represent his State in the other end of the Capitol.

The gentleman knew that at the time he spoke his State was doing especial honor to Mr. Jefferson Davis, who was making extended journeys in Alabama, and that everywhere Mr. Davis was repeating the story of his devotion to the cause of the rebellion and was being received with the acclaims of the people; that as the people of Philadelphia long ago, when Washington was going to his home after a successful warfare of eight years in which he achieved the liberties of his country, turned out to do him honor and the little maidens strewed the pathway of his horses and his carriage with flowers, so did the people in the gentleman's district and State welcome Mr. Jefferson Davis. All of his old sentiments were being uttered there—ay, and cheered to the echo by the crowd.

The gentleman felt it to be necessary for him to do something to show that he was in accord with that popular and everywhere prevalent sentiment of his State. Hence, to popularize himself at home, he makes this assault upon the nation's head. It may help him there. It will not help him with those who have heard or know of the venomous and untruthful character of that assault, and who venerate the grand character of the assailed.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman addressed some portions of his remarks to me, for which I thank him. He attempts to make me say that I desired the hanging of gentlemen who were upon the opposite side of this struggle from myself. I had made no such statement. I expressed no such sentiment; I have no such feeling. I addressed the gentleman from Alabama. I said in substance that it was Mr. Stanton's kindly hand, with others, that lifted from the gentleman's neck a halter which his own conduct had won.

I was speaking to him and of him; and he so understood it. He asked me where I had imbided this idea of hanging gentlemen. Did I discover that idea? Oh, no; I did not; I am not the discoverer of it. This idea of hanging traitors has the authority of one of much higher distinction than myself. The gentleman is a "Jacksonian Democrat;" he trains under the banner of "Old Hickory." He prides himself upon the fact that he at least is a "Jacksonian Democrat." Yet, certainly, he has not studied all the writings of that grand old man. Let me commend to him a letter bearing the date of May 1, 1833, in which Andrew Jackson writes:

MY DEAR SIR: I have had a laborious task here; but nullification is dead; and its actors and courtiers will only be remembered by the people to be execrated for their wicked designs to sever and destroy the only good Government on the globe and that prosperity and happiness we enjoy over other nations of the world. Haman's gallows—

I commend the sentence to the gentleman from Alabama—

Haman's gallows ought to be the fate of all such ambitious men who would involve their country in civil war and all the evils in its train that they might reign and ride on its whirlwinds and direct "the storm."

[Applause.]

Will the gentleman study a little more of this kind of Jacksonian Democracy in order that he may be a better Jacksonian Democrat? Those were the ideas of a Jackson Democrat; and the idea did not originate with me.

I think if he will pursue the study of the subject he will find something in the Constitution of the United States that he has several times sworn to support. Four times at least he has taken that. There he will find the definition of treason to be, "levying war against the United States; adhering to its enemies; giving them aid and comfort," and the punishment is death. If the gentleman has levied war against the United States; if he has adhered to its enemies; if he has given them aid and comfort, he ought to be able himself to settle the question as to how he should be punished under the supreme law of the land.

Mr. Chairman, I have observed that there are some gentlemen on the other side of the House who are unwilling to allow any man upon this side to refer to any of the incidents of the war without assuming to take offense. I know of no reason for this. I notice that in the campaigns that those gentlemen wage at the South they do not hesitate to discuss matters of this kind. If one of us ventures to speak of any subject connected with the war, it is at once alleged that we are "waving the bloody shirt" and trying to arouse the passions growing out of the war, that ought to be allowed to slumber. But I notice that in the Southern States no such condition of feeling obtains.

I notice that in the State of Georgia at this time there is going on a notable canvass between two distinguished citizens of that State, each one of whom, in order to secure the votes of the people, is insisting that he was the better soldier and that he contributed most to the cause of the confederacy. This is only one of many illustrations of the fact that on that side of the line there is no objection to the "waving of the bloody shirt."

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama made charges against Mr. Stanton of cruelty, of arbitrary arrests, of arbitrary dismissals from the service, and other kindred offenses.

It seems to me that if the purpose of the gentleman was what he announced it to be, to correct history, or to write history, he might have found some subjects for discussion nearer home—subjects of which he knew something. He might have discussed and reprobated, if he wished, the cruelties of the conscription laws of the Confederate States, a conscription law which swept all the white males from fifteen years of age to fifty into the army, without reference to what their sentiments may have been.

Under that law the most patriotic man in the land, thoroughly loyal to the United States, might have been, and in thousands of instances was, forced into a service that he abhorred. Yet the gentleman has no criticism for such cruelty as that. He has no criticism to make with regard to the outrages and cruelties of Salisbury and Andersonville—none at all. I remember that twenty-six men from my own county were captured by the forces under the command of the gentleman from Alabama, and were by them sent to endure the horrors of Andersonville; and all of those man, though then young, stalwart, hale and hearty, are to-day either dead or prematurely old, broken down by the outrages perpetrated on them there. But the gentleman from Alabama has no word of disapprobation for matters of that kind.

No one ought to expect that Mr. Stanton would escape criticism, but it seems to me that one ought to consider his surroundings, the situation he was placed in, and the difficulties incident to his career. He was surrounded by enemies, who were ready to assail him because of personal reasons. There were the contractors, who were trying to gorge themselves upon the public Treasury; then there were persons whose ambitions were not sympathized in by him and who naturally antagonized him.

During his term of office twenty-five thousand commissions were issued by the Secretary of War; more than two million of men were placed in the armies, with all the arms, accouterments, and equipments such a vast host required; more than two billions of money was expended by his Department during the time he was Secretary of War, and yet no dollar, no cent of that was ever charged to have been improperly expended for his benefit.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit me to read a brief letter of the date of November 18, 1862, I think it will throw some light upon the point he is now discussing.

Mr. HEPBURN. I gladly yield for that purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. It is a letter from Edwin M. Stanton to Rev. Heman Dyer, the gentleman who received the letter which I was permitted to read a few days ago. Instead of sending this letter to the Clerk's desk, I propose to read it myself.

WASHINGTON, November 18, 1862.

DEAR SIR: Your note of the 11th instant has remained unanswered because of the pressure of business, which left me neither time nor strength to respond.

When General McClellan failed to obey the order of the President to move against the enemy, given on the 1st of October, I thought he ought to be removed upon the spot. Nearly a month—time enough to have had a victorious campaign—was lost by his disobedience of orders. When his creatures and those who are enemies of the country undertook to apologize for his delay by the false pretense that he needed supplies that were held from him by the War Department, my duty to the country required the exposure of the falsehood, and I demanded a report on the subject from the general-in-chief.

It is not my fault that he was not removed before the New York election after his disobedience of orders. The loss of three weeks' time rests not on my shoulders. In respect to any combination by Mr. Chase, Mr. Seward, and myself against General McClellan, it is utterly false. For reasons needless to mention, fire and water would as soon combine. Each does his duty as he deems right. In respect to the imputation of selfish or ambitious motives denial is needless. Those who make the imputation do it ignorant of my principles of action, or with prejudiced feelings, and, like all other public men, I must expect and patiently bear misconception and false report.

In respect to the present position of affairs, all I can say is that the whole power of the Government is being put forth with more vigor and I think more earnestness on the part of military commanders than at any former period. Treason is encouraged in the Northern States by the just discontent of the people. But believing our national destiny is as immediately in the hands of the Most High as ever were the children of Israel, I am not only undismayed, but full of hope.

For myself, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left, serving no man and at enmity with none, I shall strive to perform my whole duty in the great work before us. Mistakes and faults I no doubt may commit, but the purpose of my actions shall be single to the public good.

With sincere regard, I am yours, truly,

EDWIN M. STANTON.

Rev. H. DYER.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Iowa for his courtesy in yielding to me.

Mr. HEPBURN. And, Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for presenting at this opportune moment this letter. Its statements make thoroughly complete a letter that I desire to read. I have this morning received a letter from Hon. Charles A. Dana, who was the Assistant Secretary of War during the period of Mr. Stanton's service. No man can speak of Mr. Stanton with more of authority than this distinguished gentleman. He was in position to know. His high character gives certainty to his statements. The letter reads:

NEW YORK, June 17, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I am sorry to say that my period of intimacy with Mr. Stanton and of service under him in the War Department did not really begin until after General McClellan had been removed. For this reason I am not able to speak upon that point from personal knowledge of my own. But upon the general question of Mr. Stanton's purposes, I can say most emphatically that in all my acquaintance with him he never had but one purpose in his mind, and this was to carry the war efficiently forward to a victorious conclusion. He had no friends but those who were of that mind, and he knew no enemies but those whom he regarded as the enemies of his country. Whoever was not for prosecuting the war most vigorously, whoever hesitated, whoever interposed obstacles, whoever in his opinion failed to come up to the high mark of zeal and thoroughness, might be certain to have Mr. Stanton for a critic and an antagonist. Of himself, of his own personal interests and advancement, no man could be less careful than he was. All mercenary considerations he despised, and the end of the great struggle left him a much poorer man than he was at the beginning. All mere friendships he was ready to disregard and fling away as soon as he came to believe that their object did not share his own high and patriotic enthusiasm for the Union. He was such a man in his day and work as Oliver Cromwell was in his; and they who now propose to judge him by any narrow standard of their own are sure to judge wrongly.

Of course, a great heroic figure like Stanton is not infallible, because he is a man. It was always possible for him to judge wrongly and to be deceived by erroneous evidence. But one thing was never possible for him, and that was to be unfaithful to the Union or to show any mercy in feeling or in act toward its enemies.

It is very easy for men in this year of 1886 to find blemishes in the conduct or the character of this great man; but we who knew him thoroughly and whose fortune it was to labor at his side and under his orders, can not be mistaken in our opinion that without him the Union could not have been saved.

Believe me, dear sir, very faithfully, yours,

CHARLES A. DANA.

Hon. W. P. HEPBURN.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama in the course of his remarks frequently adverted to the fact that this controversy had been forced upon him. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that that is not a correct statement; that the gentleman himself has brought about all the controversy which has been indulged in on this subject. In the first place, his assault made upon the Judge-Advocate General's Bureau on the 11th of May was an entirely gratuitous one. Then on the 4th of June he took extraordinary pains to reiterate all the charges that he made in his first assault. Although he seven times says that others have forced this controversy upon him, I appeal to the committee as to the truth of the statement.

The gentleman says that I have forced it upon him, and as proof of that he says that during some portion of the sittings of the House I have assumed a very "martial mien." The gentleman is mistaken about that. I have no desire to have a "martial mien." The gentleman is a military character. For five years he was at West Point; for a long time he was serving in the confederate armies. I take it that he acquired a "martial mien." I understand that the first thing they get at West Point is a "martial mien," and having seen the gentleman's "martial mien," I can swear by all the Democratic gods that I at least do not want one. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman tells us that he wants peace, he wants the era of good feeling, he wants the abandonment of all consideration of the old issues. How does his conduct comport with this declaration? No member of this House has so persistently assailed the great characters of our history as the gentleman from Alabama. When the Fitz-John Porter case was under consideration, on two occasions at least he went out of his way to arraign all of those who had anything to do with the issues involved in that case. Every man who differed with him and who had aught to do with the trial of that case has come in for a full share at least of the gentleman's maledictions and vituperations.

I say to the gentleman that if he wants peace, if he really desires an era of good feeling, let him keep his sacrilegious hands off our noble dead. That will be an earnest of what he wants—an earnest of his sincerity in this behalf. I do not wish, any more than the gentleman, to arouse the ill-feeling that may be excited by a discussion of this kind; but I want him to understand that I will not submit to have those men, whose memories are embalmed in our hearts, whose memories we revere, the recollection of whose heroism, whose matchless services, whose sacrifices we remember—I will not tamely submit to have them derided, assailed, misrepresented by him.

I insist that the gentleman has been a beneficiary of the kindness of heart of Mr. Stanton. If Mr. Stanton had set his iron will against the terms of surrender which were so beneficial to the gentleman, who believes that those stipulations would have been the terms of the surrender? At that time we were in a condition to dictate what the conditions should be; our armies were the masters of the situation, and the terms agreed upon were prompted by kindness and magnanimity on the part of the Government, and no one was more prominent in those manifestations than Mr. Stanton. He says that all of these constitutional questions bearing upon his status as a citizen were settled by his surrender. I remember he was paroled, and I am reminded he is paroled to-day.

By the terms of his parol he was to go quietly to his home, and so long as he demeaned himself peaceably toward the Government so long he was to be undisturbed. The spirit of that parol required something more from the gentleman than merely the sheathing of his sword. I understand the spirit of the parol required there should be no more of vilification and slander, that it meant ceasing to wag vituperative tongues against that Government that granted the parol. I think, therefore, the spirit of that parol required the gentleman should not be prominent among those who are denouncing Mr. Stanton.

The gentleman certainly does not seem to appreciate how Stanton was esteemed by the loyal people of this country. As the writer of the letter I have referred to says, in his judgment "the war could not have terminated successfully without the aid of Mr. Stanton," so it is believed that no man could have taken his place. That is a common sentiment. Wherever patriotic sentiments are cherished the name of Mr. Stanton is remembered with love and veneration; and the gentleman could have done nothing to arouse the indignation and wrath of the people I represent more quickly than by his wanton and unjustifiable and unworthy attack upon that distinguished character. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes of his time remaining. [Cries of "Vote!" "Regular order!"] If there be no gentleman desiring to proceed with the discussion of the bill, it will be read by sections for amendment.

Mr. WISE addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, it has not been my purpose to indulge in any extended remarks on this bill, and the few observations that I have to make will be of a desultory character. I shall endeavor to confine myself to the propositions submitted in the bill, with some slight reference to suggestions and observations made yesterday by the chairman of the committee in the introduction thereof. I desire to say, at the outset, that the Republican members of the Committee on Naval Affairs from the beginning of this session have acted upon the uniform, consistent purpose of aiding in every possible way in all judicious legislation that would tend to the improvement and rehabilitation of the United States Navy. It has been our purpose scrupulously to avoid allowing our action to be in the slightest degree influenced by the fact that the control of the national administration and the management of the Navy Department have, since the last session of Congress, passed from the hands of our political friends into the hands of our political opponents.

We have endeavored to avoid, and I think my Democratic colleagues on the committee will concede that we have largely succeeded in avoiding, any imitation of the partisan captiousness which may have animated the political opposition in former committees and former Congresses. It has not been our purpose or our desire to follow the administration of the Navy Department with the microscope of criticism in order to find some slight departure from the line of procedure that would accredit itself to us upon which to hang criticisms and fault-findings. The members of this House will bear witness that during this session we have not loaded the files of the House with resolutions calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to inform Congress and the public in detail as to whether at any time during the year he had committed the indiscretion of going on board of a naval vessel. There have been no Tallapoosa resolutions introduced by us, nor have we felt it incumbent upon us to inquire whether the Despatch may have been used in the harbor of New York possibly for purposes of a social character. From the beginning it has been the purpose of the Republican members of the committee to give to the administration of the Navy Department the most cordial, earnest, and sincere co-operation in every effort toward the rehabilitation of that great and important arm of the public service. Of course, Mr. Chairman, we all understand what political exigency means.

We are all of us aware that the control of a political committee may carry with it some sort of sense of obligation to make out a case for one's party, and to make criticisms upon the opposition, and I can understand how my colleague, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, may have felt it, as undoubtedly he did feel it, incumbent upon him to scrutinize with the utmost care the administration of the Navy Department during all those years of Republican rule in order to justify, as far as possible, the claims that were made before the election, that the interests of the American people required that the administration of the navy should be transferred from Republican to Democratic hands. I bear very cordial testimony to the zeal and the industry and the energy with which the chairman of the committee has addressed himself to becoming familiar with the workings of the naval institution, and I think that his colleagues and associates on the Democratic side will need no assurance from me that he has not neglected any legitimate opportunity for criticism of Republican administration that may have fallen in his way. In view of these things, Mr. Chairman, I think I may also fittingly congratulate the Republican side of the House and the Republicans of the country that, after the administration of the Navy Department for a quarter of a century has been submitted to the keen and searching criticism of so able and zealous a gentleman as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, he has found so very few things to criticise and so very little with which any fault can be found.

With reference to the Republican administration of that great Department of the United States Government, beginning at the outbreak of a great national struggle, going through four years of such gigantic strife as the world has seldom seen, coming down through the years that have elapsed since the war, through these changing seasons in naval administration, naval construction, and naval methods, covering the great experimental period in the naval history of the world, I think we may well congratulate ourselves irrespective of party. I think the representatives and the people of the United States, rising above sectional and factional differences, may well congratulate themselves that the administration of this great Department of the Government, when overhauled and examined and scrutinized by a political opposition at the end of a quarter of a century, proves to be such that the most serious and important criticisms that can be leveled against it are comprised in the fact that we have on hand more monkey-jackets than the sailors require at this particular juncture, and that there are a few hundred pounds more of iron "spectacle-clews" for mainsails and foresails and topsails of the Navy than we are likely to want during the next few years. And, in view of these criticisms as to alleged unnecessary expenditure, or excessive provision for the wants of the future in regard to clothing and clew-irons, it must be borne in mind that the pea-jackets are all there, and that up to date the iron for the spectacle-clews is safe in the storehouse, "present and accounted for." It has not been made away with; there is no deficit; there has been no embezzlement, no abstraction.

Mr. Chairman, there is another feature in regard to this matter of what has been criticised as an extraordinary expenditure for clothing that had better perhaps be referred to at this time. While I am in no wise constrained to make any special apology for any special feature of the details of administration of the Navy Department during the past twenty-five years, and while I am quite ready to admit that there may have been some slight mistakes made even under the beneficence of Republican rule, seldom as those mistakes seem to have occurred in any of the Departments, if we may judge from the failure of our Democratic brethren to discover them, yet it ought to be borne in mind that these large purchases of clothing do not represent a loss to the Government of the United States, for if an examination of the appropriations is made it will be found that since 1874, when these large purchases were made, there has been a corresponding decrease in the appropriations, and that the money expended for this clothing has been flowing back into the Treasury in the clothing fund by the sale of these materials to the sailors of the Navy.

It is proper, Mr. Chairman, in this connection to add that this alleged excessive purchase of material in the Bureau of Equipment in regard to canvas does not constitute an indictment or a legitimate cause of complaint against the organization or the political administration of the Navy Department. This matter of the purchase of canvas, upon which such stress has been laid, was one entirely within the purview of the regular officers of the Navy in control of that bureau. Whatever criticism there may be, whatever fault may legitimately be found, goes directly to the administration of the affairs of bureaus by the regular officers having supervision thereof, and is in no wise chargeable to the political or the civil administration of the Department.

I have in my hand the report of the evidence given before our committee by the chief bureau officers. In the evidence of Commodore Schley, the chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, in the course of whose examination these matters were fully discussed, he stated that at present his bureau was "working like a clock," that none of the criticisms were at present applicable to the operations of his department; and in reply to a question by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], whether this reorganization had been effected under the present administration, he replied that it had. But, in reply to a subsequent question by myself as to when he was assigned to the post which he now occupies, he replied that he was assigned just after he came from the arctic region, in October, 1884. The question was then asked:

Did you commence reorganization at once?

His reply was:

I began by simplifying these methods, introducing more system in the ways commonly employed by business men outside.

Q. Did you receive the co-operation of the former Secretary of the Navy?
A. Yes, sir.

There we have the testimony of Commodore Schley, a gentleman who has been very properly referred to in the remarks of the chairman of the committee as a model of efficiency and ability in the control of his department, that the reforms that were necessary, that the correction of these faults to which reference has been so conspicuously made, did not depend upon the advent of a Democratic administration, but were begun immediately upon his appointment by a Republican Secretary of the Navy.

As I said at the outset, it is not my purpose upon this bill to indulge in any extended or elaborate remarks; and, in conclusion, I will say that as an entire measure appropriating money for carrying on the Naval Department the Republican members of the committee will be found giving a cordial support to the general features of the bill. There are some points upon which amendments will be offered and some criticisms which may be made during the five minutes' debate, when that shall arise. I understand that the chairman of the committee yesterday in his opening remarks explained the effect of the discrepancy between the estimates and the appropriation for pay for the Navy, which is some $800,000 less in the bill than appeared in the estimates. I understand that an amendment will be offered at the proper time to reappropriate the surplus five hundred and odd thousand dollars of the former appropriation, which, under a recent ruling of the Comptroller, would not be available this year without such reappropriation.

I find also in the bill some provisions that seem to be obnoxious to the point of order that was made upon the legislative bill, provisions that would have the effect of enacting laws in regard to the salaries of officials, and I give notice now that at the proper time the point of order will be made upon some of those provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Chairman, I share the feeling of, I presume, a large number of members of this House, I will not say of disgust, but I will say the feeling of revolt against the attempt in the American Congress to wash our dirty linen before the people of the world. It does not add to the dignity of this House nor to the force of any argument which has been made here to indulge in sulphurous denunciation of the one section of our beloved country by the other, or to fight over again ad nauseam the fratricidal battles of 1861 to 1865. I congratulate the House most heartily upon a return again to the bill that is before us and to the questions which should legitimately occupy the attention of this House in the remarks of the gentleman last on the floor, and sincerely hope that hereafter gentlemen in discussing this measure will stick to the bill and not to a constituency a thousand miles away, and recognize the fact that we legitimately have before the House the naval appropriation bill, not the resurrected hates of a deadly civil war.

Permit me to say, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs—and it is with great pleasure that I do so—that our Republican brethren on the other side of this House who are members of this committee have heartily co-operated in the preparation of this bill. They have met us with a frankness and a fairness and a patriotism that is worthy of all commendation in the effort honestly to provide for the support of the Naval Department of this Government.

I submit, sir, that a careful examination of the bill which has been submitted to the House for the maintenance of the Navy Department exhibits the care and scrutiny exercised by members of both sides of the House, who have met together not in hostile array, but in the most friendly accord, to provide for the exigencies of the hour and to present an honest bill—not, as has been sometimes charged, to cut down appropriations because the amount asked was large, or to add simply in a spirit of favoritism, but honestly to determine what each branch of the Navy Department requires for its financial needs, and then in a spirit of fairness to appropriate just that amount. I believe that this spirit prevades the entire bill.

There is one measure which has been commented upon to some extent to which I desire to call the attention of the House for a few moments. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK], in that pleasing and genial manner in which he always presents his case, and in language that wins our regard if not assent, has seen fit to take exception to the dropping of the war college at Newport, R. I. Now, I agree with the gentleman from Connecticut that there is need, if we propose to keep abreast of the great maritime nations of the world, that we shall have an advanced or post-graduate course for those who are to be officers of our Navy. I believe the battles of the future on the water are to be fought not as formerly by vessels which overcome the opposing vessels with a sweeping broadside or by boarding. That time is passed.

It will be the gun of long range, it will be the swift battering ram, it will be the cruiser, it will be the torpedo, it will be an encounter of intellectual naval giants that will decide the great naval battles of the future. And when that time comes we shall need the highest American talent; we shall want to take from our midst the brightest and noblest boys that go to Annapolis or elsewhere and clothe them with all the power, with all the preparation that we can give them by the most advanced methods of instruction. Therefore, I say that perhaps one of the crying needs of the Navy Department is that we shall take those young men and place them upon the very highest level of scientific attainments. But Newport is not the place.

I must say, in passing, that the war college there was established not by authority of law, but by an order of the then Secretary of the Navy. Recognizing, I concede, the need of the hour, he saw fit to establish this college; and it was, as the gentleman from Connecticut has said, recognized in some subsequent appropriation bills. It therefore has a legal standing in this Congress.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. LORE. I am very glad to have the gentleman do so.

Mr. BUCK. I find upon examination since yesterday that there was a statute which authorized the appropriation for this college.

Mr. LORE. Was it prior to its establishment?

Mr. BUCK. I find in the sundry civil appropriation act of August 7, 1882, the following:

> For repairing and extending wharf and the erection of boat-houses on Coasters' Harbor Island, $5,000. And the cession by the State of Rhode Island to the United States of said island for use as a naval training station is hereby accepted.

Under that statute the appropriation was made.

Mr. LORE. But that does not cover the precise ground of which I am speaking. It was not an enabling law. It was a recognition, not of the war college proper——

Mr. BUCK. It was a recognition of the station.

Mr. LORE. It was a recognition of the propriety of that sort of school.

Mr. BUCK. It was an acceptance by the United States of the cession made by Rhode Island for the establishment of a naval training school, and the property thus ceded has been used ever since for that purpose, and that purpose only.

Mr. LORE. I think my friend will agree with me that there was no original legislation creating a war college proper, but that the institution originated, very properly, in the mind of the Secretary of the Navy; and the legislation to which the gentleman refers was rather approving legislation than originating legislation.

Mr. SPOONER. The gentleman from Delaware will permit me to inquire whether the legislation referred to by the gentleman from Connecticut is not quite as efficient as if there had been an act establishing the institution in the first place.

Mr. LORE. I fully agree with my friend from Rhode Island that the propriety and necessity of the institution and its subsequent recognition by acts of Congress, make it a legal institution to that extent.

Mr. BUCK. The act to which I have referred was passed in 1882, before any sort of order on the subject had been issued by Secretary Chandler.

Mr. LORE. But I do not think it had in view, as my friend if he examines the law will see, the establishment of what is now designated as the naval war college. The act had in contemplation rather some general training in this regard.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not at all material in this case. There was a Congressional recognition, as I believe, of the institution which had been previously established under the authority of the Navy Department. But Newport was not the place for such an institution. A recent visit to the school at Annapolis has thoroughly convinced me that we have there a place ready at hand for a college of that character, whenever we desire it. I do not think it would be wise to make an appropriation for it in this bill, because there has been as yet no well-digested plan presented to the Naval Committee upon which we could act with any degree of intelligence. If we are to establish a war college, as I believe we should, it ought to be at Annapolis. A recent visit to the academy there as one of the Board of Visitors, has given me a very high opinion of that institution.

We have there not only a large and able corps of skilled professors, selected from the whole naval establishment for fitness in their several duties, but we have the plant necessary for this post-graduate course, to which very little addition need be made. We have chemical laboratories, machine-shops, arms and equipments of all grades, ample grounds, and all mechanical and scientific appliances. We have also buildings, as the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs said. The Government, in 1869, having over 100 acres of ground which is outside of the academy grounds proper, erected a very large brick hospital, which is most admirably adapted to the needs and wants of a war college of the character I speak of when it shall be necessary to establish it. This building is now boarded up, untenanted, save in one or two rooms by a temporary care-taker, and is a standing invitation for use as a first-class war college.

Now, Mr. Chairman, instead of creating an entirely new pair of steps by which you must ascend the educational structure from the bottom, as in Rhode Island, where we must originate the entire plan, where we must get a complete corps of professors, where we must get the machinery and everything of that character, instead of creating a new stair-way, all we have to do at Annapolis is to add one or two more steps to those already erected, so that these young men may mount to the highest plane of scientific attainment, and climb to the top room of "wisdom's wondrous building."

I wish to say the Naval Academy, with its buildings and grounds constituting one of the most beautiful spots my eyes have ever rested upon, under the management of the present superintendent, Capt F. M. Ramsey, has as an educational institution attained a degree of exactness, a degree of discipline, a degree of perfection in the mental and physical training of our young men of which I think we as a people may be justly proud. The institution is a model one. If we desire, therefore, to establish this war college, let us do it as wise people of other countries have done. Let us simply add to the Naval Academy, and make it a great naval university by additional machinery, the additional plant that may be necessary, and not create an entirely new and original plant, which is but the beginning of a new college and vast expenditure. Let us keep the advanced scholars under the charge of the able corps of professors in that school. If you please, add one or more, in order that, as we propose, we may stand in the advanced rank of naval education in the world.

While I agree with the necessity for this college, while I am prepared, at the proper time, whenever the proper scheme is presented, to vote—and I shall cheerfully vote—for such an appropriation and for such an establishment, this bill is not the place for nor is this the time to make a start in that direction until a carefully prepared scheme shall be devised and presented.

Mr. Chairman, it was therefore wise the appropriation was omitted from this bill. I do not wish to see our naval education divided, part located in Rhode Island and another part in Maryland. I do not wish to see our energies divided, but rather that they should be concentrated in one place, so as to secure the results which come from a large, strong, well-constructed, and thoroughly equipped institution.

One more suggestion. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of total indifference to the American people whether the bill we have prepared is $200,000 less or $500,000 more than the naval appropriation bills heretofore presented to the House. All that is asked of this House the extended debate in this respect dwarfs to insignificance. All that the country demands of the Naval Committee is that the bill presented shall be an honest bill, having in it adequate appropriations for every branch of the naval establishment without room for extravagant expenditures, with every estimate fairly made and every need of the American Navy honestly measured and provided for. If they are not so made in this bill it is because the committee were unable to get an intelligent understanding of the condition of that particular branch where a deficiency exists.

There are some respects in which each member of the committee perhaps would like amendments to be made. It is almost impossible in a body of men like that for all to get precisely what each would like. But I desire to say this, that in the outcome, that in the aggregate, the bill meets with the approval of the committee, and I trust and I believe the House will with some unanimity second the report of the committee and give their labor the form and force of law.

After this naval appropriation bill has been disposed of we can then go to the other question of the enlargement of our Navy, as it is presented in the other bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and in which we are all so deeply interested. [Applause.]

I reserve whatever time I have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes of his time.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to avail myself of the latitude of debate allowed in Committee of the Whole to discuss one great question relating to the industrial interests of the country; but as I have no wish, sir, to consume the time of the committee in the discussion of the question, limited as I am, I will ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MORRISON. Do I understand the gentleman is going to make some remarks on this subject, the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. MARTIN. I think they are as pertinent to the subject as those we have heard here this morning.

Mr. MORRISON. I wanted to interpose an objection, after the gentleman had voted against the consideration of another subject—the tariff—to a proposition to make a speech in the House on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, frree lumber, free salt, free wool, and free fish to-day mean free "iron-ore," "free mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought," free "coal," and free "coke" to-morrow. The former might not predjudice the interests of Alabama, while the latter would deal a death-blow to the growing mining and manufacturing interests of our State; it would put an end to the development of her resources, and stop, indefinitely, the further progress of our people in mining and manufacturing. Free lumber, free salt, free wool, and free fish are reported on the free-list by your Committee on Ways and Means; and free iron-ore, free coal, free coke, and free mineral substances, &c., are what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] had intended should go on the free-list, and were included in the free-list of the original bill, which he introduced into this House on the 15th of February last.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] was very bold, and he meant to pass a bill, if he could, which the whole country would feel from the heart of its commercial life to its upper and nethermost extremities. But your committee lacked the dash and boldness of their intrepid leader, and sought to win by more conservative means. "Divide and conquer," said your committee. Let us strike down, in the first instance, unorganized labor; let us strike down wool, so recently fully protected by the tariff bills of 1866 and 1867; and then we shall have the assistance of the persons representing such interest in this House to put upon the free-list other articles—raw materials, they are called—which are now protected by the existing tariff. I can see, Mr. Chairman, the destruction of Alabama's mining and manufacturing interests if this be done, and no earthly consideration shall cause me to falter in the duty which I owe to the State and people of Alabama, and of my district, of voting against this bill.

There was more in that famous declaration of General Hancock that "the tariff is a local question" than any one then imagined; but when we learn who it is that would have a high protective tariff, and who would impose duties ad valorem without regard to the protection of domestic industries, we find that here, as elsewhere, every man is in favor of what he believes will advance his pecuniary interests and those of his constituents.

I was asked some days ago to state how I stood upon the tariff; whether I favored a "high protective tariff;" "a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection;" or "free trade?" These expressions have a technical meaning in the vocabulary of every man using them; and they mean the same thing with no two men; hence the folly of declaring in favor of either one or the other. Let not one man say I am of Paul, and another I am of Apollos, but, remembering the solemn pledge of the Democratic party to revise the war tariff in the manner specifically set forth in the platform of the National Democratic party, adopted at Chicago in June, 1884, let us take this "Morrison bill," as it is styled, in our hands and apply the test of that platform to it.

The pledge of the Democratic party to revise the tariff must be faithfully kept and performed. Mr. Cleveland now occupies the White House upon the faith reposed in us by the American people. If that platform admits of a double construction, the one which will secure the protection of our own people and the other which would lead to injury or destruction of all American enterprises for the sake of cheaper markets in which to buy, then for Heaven's sake let us put the same construction upon the language employed which we gave to it in the presence of every laboring man while the Presidential campaign was in progress. Any other course would be, in my judgment, unworthy of the party, and would secure disaster to our cause during the coming November elections.

The measure under consideration is of more importance to the American people than perhaps any other of our present session. We may vote away the public money recklessly, violate every duty which we owe to the people as their stewards, and the mischief done thereby will be insignificant comparatively to passing a measure which, if it should become a law, would destroy certain American enterprises and leave many of our laboring men engaged in them without employment. Already great strikes have shaken the leading industries of the Union, and some enterprises are tottering because of the unsettled condition of the country; and yet we are gravely discussing how we may further cripple labor, for it is nothing less, and retard the wonderful progress of our industrial classes. If we would consent to admit the true cause of the strikes, namely, the demand of the American laborer for greater opportunity for self-enlightenment, and for the means of better feeding, better clothing his family, and of educating his children, we would see at once the utter futility of the effort to relegate the laborer back into his former condition of almost servile dependence.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have seemingly digressed, and will return to the inquiry: Does this bill revise the war tariff of 1861, in the manner laid down in the platform of the National Democratic party? If so, if it were a true revision, I should feel constrained to support it; for I am sure that neither in word, thought, nor action have I ever gone astray from the principles of Democracy as laid down in that platform.

Let us now examine the positions upon the tariff taken so distinctly by both great political parties in 1884.

Before doing so we should recall the fact that an evil genius obtained dominion over the Democratic party in 1880, when the false doctrine of "tariff for revenue only" was incorporated into its platform; and an eminent soldier, who had never studied the subject, was placed upon it, to find it as treacherous as the trap-door of the gibbet. It brought defeat to our party, but the affliction was sanctified to us; we saw the light, even in the gloom of defeat; and the declaration was distinctly made at Chicago that—

> The necessary reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

True it is that the further declaration is distinctly made that Federal taxation shall be exclusively for public purposes, and shall not exceed the needs of the Government economically administered; and the sentiment is re-echoed by every genuine Democrat in the land; and yet we declare that our party won its triumph mainly upon the distinct denunciation of the Republican party for having "deprived labor of employment and of just reward." The Democratic party is the declared friend of the laboring man, and every article of the platform breathes a desire to protect and foster his interests and in every way known to the political economist to exalt him among men and to better his condition. Such principles are worthy of this enlightened age; they thrilled the American people throughout this vast country and secured for us a splendid victory in the face of incredible difficulties.

Mr. Chairman, the platform of our party was not a snare and a lie, but the faithful expression of pure Democratic principles, proclaimed by the party's most enlightened following. It declared that "the Republican party during its legal, its stolen, and its bought tenures of power has steadily decayed in moral character and political capacity;" and we are on trial before the country, and must show that our promises to protect the labor element of the country were not toils and delusions to ensnare the trusting and unsophisticated laborer. To this circumstance I invite the careful attention of the House: That no protection, in the sense of putting money into his pocket by taxing other people to do it, is anywhere promised in our platform to the capitalist because of his plant. On the contrary, the taxes are to be laid "on fewer imported articles, bearing heaviest on articles of luxury and bearing lightest on articles of necessity."

Our platform, Mr. Chairman, is the shield and buckler of the poor laboring man; and if we purpose to continue in power as a party let us never forget the friends who filled our ranks in the day of battle and uttered the battle-cry as we rushed upon our political foes and achieved the victory of 1884.

The protection to the capitalist is wholly incidental, and intended to be so; for the duties are to be collected under our platform for revenue purposes, and are to be so laid as to "cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of higher rate of wages prevailing in this country." "But, in making reduction in taxes, it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but rather to promote their healthy growth," is the language of the platform—a strange way of taxing for their benefit by reducing the rate of duty. And if further evidence were needed that our platform upon the tariff was framed in the interest of the workingman, we repeat one of its charges against the Republican party: "It has subjected American workingmen to the competition of convict and imported contract labor."

In my examination of the subject I pass now to the consideration of the platform of the Republican party. It is a matter of profound surprise that any intelligent man should declare there was little or no difference on the subject of the tariff between the two great political parties. How reads the tariff plank of the Republican party?

> We therefore demand that the imposition of duties on foreign imports shall be made not "for revenue only," but that in raising the requisite revenues for the Government such duties shall be so levied as to afford security to our diversified industries and protection to the rights and wages of the laborer, to the end that active and intelligent labor as well as capital may have its just reward and the laboring man his full share in the national prosperity.

And again, that platform declares:

> The Republican party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff and to reduce the surplus, not by the vicious and indiscriminate process of horizontal reduction, but by such methods as will relieve the tax-payer without injuring the laborer or the great productive interests of the country.

What, then, is the difference between the two parties, and what marked result characterized the last canvass for the Presidency? It is this: That the Republican party pledged itself to protection for the sake of protection; it pledged itself "to afford security to our diversified industries" that labor "as well as capital" might "have its just reward;" and the marked feature of the campaign was the fact that the capital of the country was on the side of Mr. Blaine. It was because the Republican party was too heavily loaded with (what the country believed to be) the spoils of a "protective tariff for the sake of protection," because it was drunk with success and its barns were bursting with fatness, that the people who had borne such political wrongs were enabled to overthrow the hosts of the enemy.

All other differences were merged in this one: That while the Republican party would secure protection to labor as well as capital, the Democratic party promised to protect labor with only incidental protection to capital. We have now, Mr. Chairman, the criterion by which our bill must be tried. There is no longer a question as to the character of the tariff, for a tariff of some sort we are bound to have; but the issue is, whether or not the present bill violates the pledges of the Democratic party to the laboring men of the country, or is in any true or proper sense a revision of the present tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests.

Proceeding to the examination of this bill, the first thing which attracts our attention is the free-list. We find remitted by it on wood and lumber $1,072,063.18; on salt, $751,390.24; on textile fibers, $1,947,459.39; on fish, $83,124.18; and on wools, &c., $3,243,200.01; aggregating a total of $7,097,237.00; a good showing truly, if from it we are to understand that that sum of money is to be kept in the pockets of the people, instead of being drawn out in the shape of taxes. But this is not all. It must be accomplished without wronging the laboring man, whom we have promised to protect. Your committee, in recommending this free-list, have assigned the reasons which influenced them as to each item, and if their reasoning is novel and peculiar they must not complain if they find earnest men in this House who are not impressed by such reasoning. The report on the items named in the free-list is as follows:

The duties intended to be removed by the bill are chiefly those which tax articles used by our own manufacturers, which now subject them to a hopeless competition at home and abroad with the manufacturing nations, none of which taxes such materials, that our own manufacturers may successfully compete, both at home and abroad, with manufacturing nations which do not tax such materials, thus securing markets for the products of hands now idle for want of work to do. Some of the materials upon which great industries are built, such as wood, salt, hemp and wool, are placed on the free-list.

The report then continues:

In the past twenty years we have obtained from tax on imported wood an amount estimated at less than $20,000,000, to encourage felling our trees and destroying our forests. In a much shorter period we have given more than 35,000,000 acres of land in bounty to encourage the planting of trees.

Now, one would imagine from these extracts that the lumber business of the country had been a losing business to the Government, and that it would have kept money in the pocket to have left every tree standing untouched by the woodman's ax. This language on the part of a statesman is certainly remarkable. What became of the trees which were felled and the lumber put upon the market thereby? How many men have grown rich in the lumber business; how many mouths have been fed; how many bodies clothed, and how many children have been educated out of the incomes derived from the business? But the report says that less than $20,000,000 have been obtained by encouraging the felling of trees and destroying our forests.

Is it wrong to fell a tree or destroy a forest for commercial purposes; to build houses, to convert a portion into furniture, and use the balance for the comfort of mankind? But the committee declare that in a much shorter time the Government has given 35,000,000 acres of land in bounty to encourage the planting of other trees. So it appears that the lumber business of this country has been enormous, although the Government has received only the beggarly sum of $20,000,000 for encouraging that industry. The same reasoning would apply to our lands worn out by the pursuit of agriculture.

But I pass to another proposition equally as surprising, when coming from such a source. We read from the report that—

The tax on imported salt is remitted to those who catch and trade in fish, and to those who pack meats for the foreign market. It is believed this tax should be remitted to all.

Now the tax on imported salt is remitted to those who catch and trade in fish and to those who pack meats for foreign markets, simply as an encouragement to the laboring people who are engaged in those pursuits. This circumstance is seized upon to strike down a great industry of the country, because a certain class get their imported salt for nothing. Would it not have been better to have made the traders in fish and the packers of meat pay the same duty as all other persons? The salt industry of the country is enormous, when the Government realizes about $750,000 per annum upon the importations of it. How many laborers are engaged in making it who will either lose their employment or its present remunerative wages, we are not told by the committee. In the views of the minority we read:

This article is manufactured in fifteen States and Territories, and exists in others. As raw material it is as cheap as sand, gravel, or clay for building purposes, and equally with them prepared for use, represents labor, and is only the more costly to the extent it is prepared for higher uses. It was protected in 1849 at the rate of 2 cents on each bushel; the price to the consumer was then $1.35 per bushel. Under the protection policy of 1861 by the development of the industry at home, the price has fallen to 8 cents a bushel, and neither as a measure of relief to the consumer nor to reduce revenues, can the proposed action be justified. Seven thousand wage-workers employed in this industry are assaulted without justification or reason.

The next statement to which we invite attention is the paragraph about hemp. It is as follows:

After a century of failure to make hemp either a profitable crop or a successful industry through protective taxation, further effort should be abandoned. For nearly a century, with only one interval, hemp has been protected, and yet its production has decreased because its culture under protection was unprofitable, while the consumption of articles manufactured from this and kindred fibers has enormously increased; until now the annual tax on imported hemp, manila, and similar fibers is several times greater than the annual value of all the hemp raised in the United States. This increasing tax is a burden alike upon the manufacturer and the consumer of such articles, and ought to be removed.

Here we are gravely told that hemp is not a profitable crop with the present rate of duty upon it, and therefore all duty should be removed and that industry discontinued; I say discontinued, because if the present tariff can not make it other than a losing crop, the removal of the duty will only make it the less profitable. And for what reason? Because its culture under protection is unprofitable, while the revenue derived from the importation of it is quite as great or greater than the value of all the hemp raised in the United States. I submit and inquire if this does not present a case under the pledge of our platform for an increase in the rate of duty upon it instead of putting it on the free-list? A moment's reflection will show you that the same thing would occur in the production or manufacture of anything else if the rate of duty did not so far protect that the American producer could compete with the imported article. The true condition of the hemp industry is shown by the following, which I clip from the views of the minority:

The report of Hon. J. R. Dodge, statistician of the Agricultural Department (Report No. 27), issued in March of this year, gives the following interesting statement of this production, which would seem to controvert the views of the majority concerning this industry:

"Mr. C. E. Bowman, commissioner of agriculture of Kentucky, and agent of the United States Department of Agriculture for that State, estimates the hemp crop grown there in 1884 at 5,000,000 pounds, that grown in 1885 at 8,000,000 pounds, and that to be grown the present season—assuming the yield to be an average one—at 10,000,000 to 12,000,000 pounds. The figures for 1884 are larger than those returned by the assessors and published in the report of the State auditor; but the auditor himself (Mr. Russell McCreary) agrees with Mr. Bowman that a true return would confirm the estimate just given. The price of hemp is now quoted at from $5.60 to $5.75 per 100 pounds, and engagements for the crop to be grown this year are being made at the rate of $5.25 to $5.50. At these figures Mr. Bowman considers this crop the best paying one now grown in the State, and anticipates that the area devoted to it will this year be from 30 to 50 per cent. greater than in 1885."

Next in order, we come to wool. Your committee in their report say, from "the beginning until now some qualities of wool have paid some rate of duty;" that "for many years last past the rate on imported wool has been more than double that imposed on other products of pasture, field, and farm." Upon what other "products of the pasture, field, and farm" have duties been imposed, save on sugar, together with other articles, including those articles now enumerated in the free-list of this bill?

But we come to a most remarkable declaration, that "these other lower tax-protected products have outrun or kept far in advance of the wondrous growth of our population;" and that "wool, protected double as much, has fallen further behind."

Compare these statements with those about hemp, and we again inquire whether hemp-growing should be stricken down, if it has in fact outrun or kept far in advance of the wondrous growth of our population. Instead of being a fit subject for the free-list it is pre-eminently deserving, as a branch of American industry, the fostering protection of the Government incidentally bestowed in raising its revenue.

The minority in their views declare that "it [hemp] should have and receive fair and adequate protection and not be crippled at this time when the outlook for its profitable development promises so much." I must respectfully protest on behalf of the hemp farmer against such legislation. The proposed action in relation to hemp could alone be justified by demonstrating that our whole tariff system of incidental protection by the levying of adequate duties was false and ruinous to the country.

The following extract from the committee's report is simply astounding:

Wool finds its market at home, and its price is increased by a tax, part of the burden of which must be borne by the grower of other farm products, whose surplus in foreign markets fixes his price at home, and to the increase of which his wool-growing neighbor contributes nothing.

Remember that this is the reason assigned by your committee why the duty should be taken off wool! Where do iron, steel, in fact any of the articles produced in this country and protected by our tariff duties, find a market? Who bears "a part of the burden" but those self-same growers of "farm products, whose surplus in foreign markets fixes his price at home, and to the increase of which" his iron or steel manufacturing "neighbor contributes nothing?" If, therefore, the reason assigned for removing the duty on wool has any weight, does it not apply with equal force to every other industry of the country at present kept alive by tariff protection?

Suppose we admit the tax on woolen goods to be too high and a burden upon the tax-payers, why not revise this item of the tax-list and bring it within just, fair, and reasonable limitations? Do not strike down the great industry of wool-growing in order to enable the manufacturer, who is protected, to manufacture wool at a cheaper rate. Such action is nothing less than the declaration upon our part that what I shall denominate the productive industry of the agricultural class of our people must go upon the free-list in order that a duty may remain on woolen goods for the manufacturer's benefit. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] saw the force of this argument, and he met it at once by putting iron-ore and other raw materials upon the free-list of his original bill.

But I will not pursue this branch of the subject any further. It is evident to my mind that if the policy of this bill be followed out to its logical sequence it must result in one of two things—either absolute free trade, or the abandonment of intentional incidental protection and in a tariff for revenue only. Either one is a clear abandonment of Democratic doctrine as set forth in our platform, and would be a betrayal of the confidence reposed in us by the laboring men of America.

In conclusion, let us ascertain if this measure be truly a revision, or in the line of a revision, of the present "tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests."

The report of the committee opens in these words:

> The rate of duty or tax on imported goods subject to duty is as low as 5 on some, and higher than 200 per cent. on others.

This statement of itself demonstrates the necessity of a revision of our present tariff. No wonder that both the great political parties made haste to "denounce the abuses of the existing tariff," as the Democratic party expressed it; and to pledge "itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff," as the Republican platform has it. But each party further promised to make a reduction "without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country." Such is the language of the Democratic platform.

Will any man have the hardihood to say that this measure is not violative of that solemn declaration of protection to the American laborer? Revision, in the sense in which both political parties used the word, meant reduction; a lopping off here and there, where the duty did more than protect the laborer; where it put money, taxed from another, into the full pockets of the capitalist. Experience had taught us that this reduction could not be done by what is known as "horizontal reduction," and we are now to learn by the fate of this bill that it can not be done by striking down certain branches of industry, while others are to be continued in the genial warmth of extravagant protection. If the tax on some imported goods is but 5 per cent., while on others it is higher than 200 per cent., why did not the committee revise the whole tax-list, and give us the reduction demanded by every tax-payer in the Union? They certainly had all the means of information at hand, and the two eminent statesmen [Mr. MORRISON and Mr. HEWITT] whose bills are blended in the reported bill of your committee are certainly competent, if any men in this country are equal to it, to revise the present tariff, to reduce it in such manner as not to injure or destroy or endanger any branch of American industry. This bill does not pretend to be a revision, but merely in the line of revision. The committee say:

> All that Congress can do, in the absence of a general revision of the tariff with new and simple classifications, is to provide for each cause of complaint as it arises. In the bill proposed the most pressing and prominent of the grievances are dealt with.

Are the items named the only causes of complaint which have arisen? If not, why were other causes of complaint ignored? This bill did not cover the entire surplus of revenue; probably not half of it.

I turn from considerations which might well influence any other member of this House to one of a purely local character.

Among the stricken industries upon the proposed free-list of the tariff bill of the coming Fiftieth Congress, I think I see iron, and coal, and sugar taking their places. Let us remember this, that a false principle, once deliberately established by a political party, will govern future action until condemned by the judgment of the people, expressed at the polls. We had an experience of that kind when General Hancock met defeat upon a platform which announced the false doctrine of a tariff for revenue only. We expunged it from our platform of principles, and in its place inserted the good, old, sound, and wholesome principle which placed Mr. Cleveland in the Presidential office. Let us now hold fast to the winning card, and not discard it on the eve of another call to show our hands.

I have seen Alabama in the recent development of her coal and iron interests, springing, as it were, into newness of life. A great city, for the South, has sprung up so suddenly and is growing so rapidly that we know of no parallel instance of it in the history of the South. Capital has come to us; forms of industries unknown to our people have taken the place of unproductive agriculture, and Alabama is about to share in the benefits arising from protecting the American laborer.

I have been urged by friends not to withhold my support from the bill, but I feel constrained to do so. It is in effect a proposition to the Alabama mining and manufacturing industries to discontinue working their plants, to discharge their employés, and to what end? Solely for the beggarly consideration of being able to buy more with a penny in a cheaper market.

Our people have learned wisdom in the school of experience, and they realize that only by means of diversified industries can they enrich their State and make themselves prosperous and respected by the world. If any principle inculcated by a political party was ever calculated to do this for a State, it is that pledge of the Democratic party to protect the laboring man in realizing good, living wages. I am, therefore, in favor of a tariff which comes up to the provisions of the Democratic platform, neither more nor less.

My first duty as a member of this House is to the General Government, but my devotion to the interests of the people of Alabama is so great that nothing appears good for the Union which would strike down the great interests of Alabama.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in submitting his bill to the House did not deem it proper to confine himself to the matters I may say legitimately presented by the bill. Had he not deemed it proper, in my humble opinion, to travel outside of the record, and in order to enable him to claim that the committee he represents, that the party he speaks for, is entitled to some advantage by virtue of the provisions of this bill, and also to attack the organization of the Navy Department and its management by preceding administrations of the Government, I would not now be tempted to submit the argument I deem it proper under the circumstances to make.

If he had not thought it incumbent upon him in order to claim that which we hear so frequently upon this floor, economy—economy by the present administration of the Government at the expense of the preceding ones—I should not allude to the figures I shall now present to the consideration of this committee. I say the gentleman will not be able to maintain his plea of economy in this particular instance. I say that he will not be able to show to this House or to the country that appropriations have been reduced under the provisions of this bill. It appears, Mr. Chairman, that the estimates for the coming fiscal year for the naval service amount to $7,129,087.50, and that the amount offered or directly appropriated by this bill is $6,312,503.26, showing a difference of $816,584.24.

But the gentleman, as was shown by my colleague from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK], was compelled to state that he was relying upon the sum of $576,380.24 coming over as a surplus from the previous appropriation bill to be used in the present fiscal year under this bill. Now, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to page 729 of the Revised Statutes, and to sections 3690 and 3691, from which it appears that this surplus to which he alludes and upon which he relies, in order to sustain the claim of economy, is covered back into the Treasury of the United States; and unless he here asks that it be reappropriated, or asks to amend his own bill and add to it said sum, that virtually according to his own statement and report there will during the coming fiscal year be a deficit of that amount. Now, in addition, items that are usually appropriated on the regular appropriation bill, as my colleague on the committee clearly demonstrated, have been carried to the other bill called the "Naval Increase bill," and they necessarily would find a place in this bill but for the fact that said additional bill has been presented, and which the gentleman from Alabama says he expects the House will take up and consider at this session.

Mr. WISE. That is true.

Mr. GOFF. That is true as my colleague and friend from Virginia says. Then that should have been plainly stated in the bill, and the honorable chairman of the committee should have given that statement in his opening remarks.

Mr. HERBERT. With the consent of the gentleman I will say that I did. A great portion of my speech was devoted to showing that it would be necessary under the rule adopted to make an amendment to this bill in the form suggested.

Mr. GOFF. But it has not been carried out when you go to sum up the total of the bill, and was not presented in the light I have alluded to.

Mr. HERBERT. But I stated according to the precedents followed from Secretary Sherman to this time that it was not necessary because the surplus might have been used without making a special appropriation.

Mr. GOFF. But the statute of the United States to which I called attention has intervened since that time.

Mr. HERBERT. Not at all, I beg the gentleman's pardon. Judge Lawrence has decided the question.

Mr. GOFF. What appropriation has been so used since the Revised Statutes went into effect?

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Lawrence expressly decided when the matter of the pay of the Navy was before him in January, 1884, that there was authority for the use of this fund, and he considered this very statute in making his opinion in connection with the statute of 1874 making an appropriation for the pay of the Navy, and held that it was a continuing appropriation and did not require reappropriation.

Mr. GOFF. The items to which he alluded were the expenses involved during the fiscal year for which appropriated, and coming in after its termination, and before the expiration of the first subsequent fiscal year. It is eminently proper, and that is the theory of the law, to retain control of this surplus fund in order that the expenditures that might have been incurred but may not have been audited shall be paid out of that sum. That is the object of retaining the surplus in that condition.

But now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to another matter, and that is the bureau system. The gentleman has found it necessary in order to claim extravagance in previous administrations to make the declaration that the system of organization now existing in the Navy Department is vicious.

The Secretary of the Navy in his report of last December styled the organization of the Department of the Navy a "vicious organization." The President of the United States in his annual message to Congress alludes to that report of the Secretary and invites favorable action upon his recommendation. I claim that the honorable Secretary of the Navy made an unpardonable blunder in this particular; and I say that he has also had the manliness to admit to the Naval Committee that he did make that blunder. Therefore I am more surprised that the honorable chairman of the committee still makes this claim before the House.

The organization of the Navy Department as it exists to-day has so existed since 1843, virtually. There have been a few changes, the establishment of a bureau or so, but the theory of organization is identical. It has grown up with the needs and necessities of the Government, and the system was adopted as the result of long experience and the best thought upon the question.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his report dated November 30, 1885, said: "There is something radically wrong with the Department," and "a reform in our organization is indispensable." He asserted that the eight existing bureaus, (1) Yards and Docks, (2) Equipment and Recruiting, (3) Navigation, (4) Ordnance, (5) Construction and Repair, (6) Steam Engineering, (7) Provisions and Clothing, (8) Medicine and Surgery, should all be abolished and the entire business of the Department be confided to three new bureaus called by him (1) the Bureau of Personnel, (2) the Bureau of Material and Construction, and (3) the Bureau of Finance and Accounts. The Secretary suggested eight subbureaus in connection with said three bureaus, making, in fact, eleven in place of the eight bureaus now existing. After more carefully considering the matter, he concluded that the position he had taken was not tenable, and he abandoned it and proposed in place of the present organization five new bureaus, to be called (1) Navigation, (2) Ordnance, (3) Medicine and Surgery, (4) Material, Construction, and Repair, (5) Supplies and Accounts, with four subbureaus, making, in all, nine in place of eight, as at present provided for. How long the Secretary will hold to this view, if he has not already abandoned it, I am unable to say. As I have said, the present system is the result of many years of experience. Under it the Department successfully managed the Navy during our civil war, accomplishing under it, as all will concede, wonderful and happy results.

If you will analyze the theory of the organization of the Department, will examine into the special duties of each bureau, will observe a proper distinction between and pay proper regard to the staff and the line of the Navy, as has heretofore been done, you will see that Secretary Whitney's proposed plan of reorganization will not promote the efficiency nor aid the discipline of the Navy. You will then see, Mr. Chairman, that it will be improper, most unwise, to have line officers direct the staff in the discharge of their especial and technical duties, or the staff to attempt to control or order the line in the matter of their most important, necessary, and dangerous requirements. You do not require of your line officers, of your commodores and commanders, that they purchase the food, clothing, and other supplies for the Navy; but you do expect them to direct the movements of your ships and fleets in time of war, and to maintain the efficiency and discipline of the men under them. Nor do you expect your surgeons and paymasters to interfere with your commanding officers; but you do look to them to see to the health of and care for the disabled of our Navy, and pay the liabilities and see to the financial affairs of the Department.

Secretary Whitney's plan would strangely commingle the duties of the officers of the Navy, and would not in my opinion promote their efficiency. We do not require them to be experts in all matters relating to all branches of the service, but we do expect them to be proficient in their particular line. He who is jack of all trades, we are told, is boss of none. The Secretary stated in his testimony before the Naval Committee that his proposed plan of three bureaus was similar to the organization of the navies of the nations of foreign countries. He has not given us an instance. He can not do it. The honorable chairman of the Naval Committee can not do so; let him do so now if he can; let any of my friends of that committee who will follow me do so, if they can.

Mr. Chairman, this effort that has been made, this abuse of the system of organization, is an endeavor to sustain the charge that Republican Secretaries of the Navy under this system have been corrupt and extravagant, have used it to aid them in their partisan purposes, and, also, to account for the present deplorable condition of the Navy of this nation. It will not work, it can not be sustained. The system condemned by Secretary Whitney in his report is in effect commended by him in the last bill he has caused to be submitted, to which I have already alluded. After this, Mr. Chairman, I can well drop this branch of the question. It is very easy to tear down, to destroy an existing plan, but it is very hard sometimes to construct a new one to take its place.

I concede that some slight modifications of the present plan—not change of the system—may be made and should be made, but they are not of the character submitted by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is a change brought about by the advance of science, brought about by the enlightenment of the age in which we live, brought about by the change from the construction of wooden ships of war to the building of the iron and steel ships now found on the sea. When we build our new navy, as I trust we will proceed at once to do, the Secretary, who has direct charge of all the bureaus, and can change and apportion the duties relating to them as he may deem best, can by his own order, by the stroke of his pen, make the necessary change, one of detail merely, and not one that destroys the present admirable system of organization.

Mr. Chairman, we have not to-day a single first-class war ship. We have no war-ships we can regard with pride or satisfaction. Our position is most humiliating to the nation, to the people, to our naval officers. We have in our Navy a personnel of which we are justly proud, but our ships are now, have been for years, worthless makeshifts, the derision of the world. Time has rendered our wooden ships useless, and science long since stripped them of the virtue they once had. Improvement in naval architecture during the past twenty years has been wonderful, marvelous. We have not kept pace with the progress of the times. When it was shown that it was folly longer to continue the construction of wooden ships of war our Democratic friends refused to assent to appropriations for iron ships; and, as they were in the majority in this House, they controlled the matter. They did not wish a Republican administration to control expenditures and build a navy. So the country suffered, and year after year millions have been expended in the repair of the old wooden ships.

We do not demand a large navy, but we should have a respectable one. We will never increase our commerce until we build a navy. Both must go hand in hand together. As your navy went down, so did your commerce. As the navy shall be rebuilt, so will your commerce be restored. It is a mistake to say that we have no use for a navy, that a nation at peace with all the world needs no navy. When at peace we should send our Navy to all commercial ports where American enterprise has penetrated and is endeavoring to extend our commerce. The flag of the Union, waving from an American man-of-war in foreign ports, is a grand protection to our commerce. A good navy means good commerce, and both mean national prosperity and strength.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] says that during the past twenty years over $75,000,000 has been expended in the construction of a navy. Why does my friend talk so? Why do our friends on the other side continue to make such statements? Why did not the gentleman give this House and the country the benefit of the items of that large aggregate of money? I ask him now to do so. When was the money appropriated? Give us dates. The gentleman can not do it. No such appropriations were ever made.

Let my colleagues of the Naval Committee who follow me in this discussion explain what they mean by these statements. The fact is, we have made no appropriations, made none from 1865 down to 1883, except for eight small vessels of about 500 tons each and for the unfinished monitors. That we have no navy is not the fault of the Navy Department, under its administration by Republican Secretaries. They could not build without the means to build with, and Congress refused the means. We have appropriated and used many millions in the repairing of our old ships under, I am justified in saying, the idiotic legislation of Congress. The Republican party when it recovered control of this House in 1881 changed this method of our Democratic friends and made the first appropriations for the construction of our new Navy. Congress is to blame for the condition of the Navy, not the Navy Department.

Secretary Welles, when he retired from office, which he had filled with honor to himself and to the success and glory of the nation, in a report to this House called its attention to the requirements of the Navy, to the change in naval construction, and admonished the country that unless early steps were taken the Navy would soon be without vessels, the nation without men-of-war from which its flag could fly. Gentlemen, you should read that report. It is well, graphically written—the words of a patriot, the voice of a prophet.

Congress ignored his recommendations. There was some excuse for it then. It was the time when the change from the old to the new was in progress, from the construction of wooden to iron ships. Naval architecture was fast changing and rechanging; matters were unsettled. We had no ironclads previous to the war. It was during our civil conflict that the wonderful impetus was developed for the construction of iron ships both at home and abroad.

The first iron ship that crossed the ocean from our shores, bearing our flag to foreign lands, was visited as a curiosity, gazed upon as a wonder, taken as a model by all the world. But it had its defects; improvements were soon suggested, plans were revised, architects were uncertain. Congress awaited further developments, and repaired the old ships as the best thing then to do. Then our Democratic friends came into power in this House, and, as they and their party have been doing for years, they adopted the policy resorted to by the Republicans as the best at the time, and continued it when conditions had changed, and when other nations were utilizing time and building navies. You are always happy when you can do things that we have done, adopt policies or platforms the Republicans have used, but the good that was intended has generally been realized before you have advocated the policy. If you can tent on our old camp ground you are contented, and you do not seem to know, while you so rest, that the army of progress and enlightenment has moved on far in front of you. You are content, for you know that in the course of time you too will move on. [Applause.]

Mr. WISE. My friend from West Virginia will do me the justice to say that I stated that I did not wish to make any party capital out of this, or to appeal to any party prejudice. I stated that in my judgment the money had not been properly appropriated; holding nobody responsible.

Mr. GOFF. I did not understand my friend to say that the money had not been properly appropriated, and the inference to be drawn from his remarks was that it had not been properly expended by the Republican administration.

Mr. WISE. No, sir.

Mr. GOFF. If the gentleman means to say that it was improperly appropriated, then it was the fault of the Congress of the United States and of the Democratic majority in this House, and not the fault of the Republican Secretary of the Navy. The Republican Secretary of the Navy long years ago advised with this House upon the condition of affairs, and recommended the construction of additional ships.

Who has controlled the House of Representatives during most of the time mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia? Who reported and had charge of the appropriations for the Navy? Who was it that over and over again came in here with appropriations limiting the expenditure of money for the Navy to the repairing of old ships? Was that done by the Republicans? The honorable chairman of the present Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] was Speaker of the House during most of that period. A Democratic member of this House was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I have taken the pains to run through quite a number of these appropriation bills (not all of them), and to note the statements that were made on this subject upon the floor of the House when those bills were under consideration. I find, for instance, that Mr. Clymer, a distinguished Democratic member of Congress from the State of Pennsylvania, had charge of the bill in 1878, and said: "I call the attention of the House to the fact that this appropriation is sufficient for the actual repair of all the vessels of our Navy."

This is but a sample—one of many. So it went on year after year, limiting the appropriations to repairs, not permitting the construction of a ship. Why, sir, many millions of dollars have been expended in repairs where none should have been made. Still, until it had been determined to build new ships it was incumbent upon us to repair the old, for otherwise we would soon have had no ships upon the sea at all—not even wooden ones. Hence my Democratic friends thought it "economy," thought it "reform," to appropriate many millions to be expended in the repair of old war ships. Grand old ships they were. They bore us and our flag through many a dark hour and o'er many a tempestuous wave, landing us finally in the harbor of safety and peace, giving us national strength and renown. [Applause.] These grand old ships, I say, were worthy of some consideration, and they are the only veterans of the war that my Democratic friends want to vote arrears of pensions to every year. [Laughter and applause.]

The honorable chairman of the committee, in answer to an inquiry made by myself, stated that the committee had omitted from this bill all reference to and all appropriations for the monitors—the double-turreted monitors—the Puritan, the Amphitrite, the Monadnock, and the Terror. Now, my friends on the other side have always approached the discussion of matters relating to these monitors with a great deal of dread and anxiety. They have always looked upon any proposition for appropriations in this regard as an effort by the Republican side of the House to secure money to be improperly expended by a Republican administration—always intimating, as my friends here will remember, that the ships were absolutely worthless and that the money was desired for partisan purposes. My friends on the other side know that this has all along been the intimation, if not the charge.

Now, these much-abused vessels, these double-turreted monitors, the construction of which was commenced in 1874 and has been dragging along from that time to this with occasionally a small appropriation, and often none—these ships are to-day conceded by Secretary Whitney and the officers of the Navy Department to be the best ships of their class in the world. The Secretary of the Navy in his testimony before the Naval Committee concedes that these vessels, which have been thus shamefully treated for years, and referred to as worthless, as not fit to finish, are the finest of their class, and advises that they be completed. He recommends for the completion of these monitors an appropriation of $3,178,046. But there is not a dollar of appropriation for that purpose in this bill.

The Republican policy has always been for a navy. Republican administrations have asked of Congress from time to time, year after year, appropriations to build up a navy. The subject has been agitated on this floor. It has been contended about by conference committees at the dead hour of the night; and finally, when the clock was pointing almost to the hour of final adjournment, the friends of an efficient navy have been obliged to yield, and the reply "no navy" has been made again and again by Congress to the demand upon it.

Secretary Hunt on June 29, 1881, appointed the first advisory board to prepare a "practical and plain statement of the pressing need of appropriate vessels" for the Navy, to be presented for the consideration of Congress. This important action was taken at the suggestion of President Garfield, and much good has come from it. Rear-Admiral John Rogers was the president of this board, which also contained 1 commodore, 1 captain, 3 commanders, 3 lieutenants, 2 chief and 1 past assistant engineer, and 3 naval constructors, all capable and experienced men. They reported November 7, 1881, discussing the subject fully, and recommending 2 steel cruisers of about 5,873 tons displacement, 6 steel cruisers of about 4,560 tons displacement, 10 steel cruisers of about 3,043 tons displacement, 20 wooden cruisers of about 793 tons displacement, 5 steel rams of about 2,000 tons displacement, 5 torpedo gunboats of about 450 tons displacement, 10 cruising torpedo boats, 10 harbor torpedo boats; in all, 68 vessels of all sizes, at a total cost of $29,607,000.

This report, it should be observed, related to unarmored vessels only and did not consider ironclads. From this report sprung the first effort to build steel cruisers.

After the report of the first advisory board Congress at its next session took up the subject. The House Committee on Naval Affairs, Hon. B. W. Harris, chairman, on March 8, 1882, made a full report, and recommended the building of a part of the ships advised by the board. Congress, acting on this report, in the act of August 5, 1882, directed as follows:

> The building of one steel cruiser of between 5,000 and 6,000 tons displacement and one steel cruiser of between 4,300 and 4,700 tons displacement; the steel to have a tensile strength of not less than 60,000 pounds to the square inch and a ductility of 25 per cent. in 8 inches.

It was also provided in said act that a naval advisory board of five officers and two civilians should be appointed to aid in designing and constructing the vessels and to supervise the work.

The Secretary of the Navy was also directed to invite, by advertisement for sixty days, all competent persons to submit plans of the vessels or any part thereof.

The advertisement was issued on August 5, 1882, calling for designs within sixty days after August 20, 1882. The advisory board was organized November 13, 1882, with Rear-Admiral R. W. Shufeldt president and Chief Engineer Alexander Henderson, Commander John A. Howell, Lieut. Edward W. Very, Naval Constructor F. L. Fernald, Mr. Henry Steers, and Mr. Miers Coryell members of it.

The board was composed of as able men for the work to be done as the country could furnish—men of experience, of profound education, of the highest character. Notice as I proceed how it has been treated by Secretary Whitney.

No complete designs of cruisers had been obtained as the result of the advertisement, and a further notice was issued by the Secretary, dated November 17, 1882.

When Congress met in December, to it was submitted a report of the advisory board recommending that, in addition to the two cruisers already authorized, there be provided for one steel cruiser of about 4,000 tons displacement, three steel cruisers of about 2,500 tons displacement, and one dispatch vessel or clipper (two of these vessels are desirable) to have a sea speed of 15 knots, to be built of iron and be armed with one 6-inch breech-loading rifle and four revolving guns, and one cruising torpedo-boat.

In the naval appropriation of March 3, 1883, Congress appropriated $1,300,000, as follows:

For the construction of the steel cruiser of not less than 4,300 tons displacement now specially authorized by law.

For two steel cruisers of not more than 3,000 nor less than 2,500 tons displacement each.

For one dispatch boat, as recommended by the naval advisory board in its report of December 20, 1882.

The Secretary of the Navy was directed to invite proposals and to award contracts "to the lowest and best responsible bidder or bidders," subject to such provisions for the security of completion as he might prescribe and in accordance with the act of August 5, 1882.

It was found by the Department that the cruiser of between 5,000 and 6,000 tons could not be built within the limit of cost fixed by Congress. The general features of a steel cruiser of 4,300 tons, two cruisers of 3,000 tons, and a dispatch boat of 1,500 tons were prepared by the advisory board and on March 23, 1883, submitted by letter to the shipbuilders who it was thought likely would make proposals for construction, and they were requested to make advice and suggestions which would enable the Department to reach "such final plans and specifications as will give the most effective ship of the class which can be built."

Advertisements, dated April 28, were issued May 2, 1883, asking proposals for the four ships, to be received July 2.

Proposals were received for all the ships except the smaller, the Dolphin, from (1) The Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, of Wilmington, Del.; (2) Cramp & Sons, Philadelphia; (3) John Roach, of New York; for the largest, the Chicago, also from the Delamater Works, New York; for the Atlanta, from the Quintard Iron Works, New York; for the Boston, from Harrison Loring, of Boston; and for the Dolphin, from Cramp & Sons, Mr. Roach, Allen & Blaisdell, of Saint Louis, and H. A. Ramsay & Co., of Baltimore.

Mr. Roach was the lowest bidder on all the ships, and the contracts were awarded to him; the estimates, the contract prices, and the next lowest bids were as follows:

Vessels.	Cost estimated by the advisory board.	Contract prices.	Next lowest bids.
Chicago	$1,248,000	$889,000	$1,080,000
Boston	783,500	619,000	650,000
Atlanta	783,500	617,000	650,000
Dolphin	399,000	315,000	375,000

The contract prices were $315,000 less than the next lowest bids and $774,000 less than the estimated cost.

John Roach had already spent his money in building his plant, had already been to the expense that these men who bid next highest, bid hundreds of thousands of dollars over him, would have been compelled to go to if the contract had been let to them. John Roach was prepared to make his own steel, to furnish his own material—the others must purchase it, import much of it, and hence they estimated for it in their bids. Hence it was that Roach could so far underbid his rivals in this branch of American industry and labor, of which he was the pioneer, and for being which, and on account of his devotion to that principle without which his great establishments could not survive a day, he has been branded as a "rascally contractor," and persecuted by those who, weak of themselves, pygmies by his side, are strong only on account of the accident of official position. [Applause.]

The contracts with Mr. Roach were dated July 23, 1883, except that for the Chicago, which was July 26, 1883. The essential stipulations of all the contracts, taken from that of the Dolphin, were as follows:

DOLPHIN'S CONTRACT.

The preamble recites the authority to build given by Congress, the advertisement, proposal, and acceptance, and that "the drawings and specifications required by the act of August 5, 1882, have been duly provided, adopted, and approved, in accordance with the provisions of said act relating thereto." The contractor thereupon agrees—

1. That he will build the dispatch boat "in conformity with the aforesaid plans and specifications hereto annexed and in accordance with the provisions of the acts of Congress approved August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883, respectively, before mentioned and relating thereto."

2. "The construction of the hull and machinery and the fittings of the vessel shall conform in all respects to and with the plans and specifications hereto annexed, which plans and specifications shall be deemed and taken as forming a part of this contract and with the like operation and effect as if the same were incorporated therein."

Changes are not to be made or paid for except in accordance with the acts of Congress.

3. Materials and workmanship shall be "first class and of the best quality," subject to the inspection of the advisory board.

4. The steel used shall conform to the tests prescribed by the board and approved by the Secretary, June 18, 1883.

5. All necessary additional working plans will be made by the contractor and approved by the board.

6. The contractor will pay all inventors or patentees for designs or devices used.

7. The vessel shall be completed and ready for inspection and delivery before the end of twelve months. The lien of the United States shall attach for each payment as it is made.

8. The contractor shall keep the ship insured for the benefit of the United States.

9. The vessel shall be sufficiently strong. When ready for delivery she shall be subjected to a trial trip and accepted only on these conditions:

First. The working of the machinery shall be to the satisfaction of the advisory board.

Second. The indicated horse-power shall be 2,300, maintained for six hours, "provided that in case of the failure of the development of this power the vessel shall be accepted if it can be shown to the satisfaction of the naval advisory board and the Secretary of the Navy that this failure was due neither to defective workmanship nor materials."

Third. Any defect in the engines discovered within four months after acceptance shall be repaired by the contractor.*

Fourth. The weight of machinery and boilers shall not exceed 430 tons, under a penalty of $2,000 for over 5 per cent. excess, and also $200 for each ton over the 5 per cent. excess.

10. If the result of the trial trip is satisfactory the vessel shall be accepted and final payments made, except $8,000 to be held until after a final trial trip, to be made three months after the preliminary acceptance. If on the final trip or within such three months any defect from bad workmanship or material appears, the same must be repaired by the contractor. After final acceptance the $8,000 will be paid.

11. In case the work does not make satisfactory progress toward completion the Secretary may declare the contract forfeited, and thereupon the contractor shall become the debtor of the United States for all payments made him and the Secretary shall proceed to have a valuation made of the work already done.

12. After the valuation the Secretary may, in his discretion, proceed to complete the ship, with authority to use the contractor's yard, plant, and material.

13. The work shall be completed by the Secretary at the contractor's risk and expense. A final settlement is provided for.

14. The vessel is not to be accepted unless completed in strict conformity to the contract, under the supervision of the board, and in accordance with the provisions of the acts of August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883.

15. No member of Congress or Government official is to be interested in the contract.

16. The United States agree to pay for the vessel $315,000 in ten equal installments with a reservation of 10 per cent. on each installment; the last payment not to be made until acceptance of the vessel as in the tenth clause recited. Upon performance of the contract the reservations are to be paid. Disputes concerning the meaning of drawings or specifications or discrepancies between the same and the contract are to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy.

A bond of the contractor with two sureties accompanied the contract. It will be seen that the terms of the contracts were just and appropriate and that there was no lack of effective stipulations to protect the Government.

The law requiring the ships to be built of steel of great tensile strength and ductility caused the contractor much difficulty, and there were some changes which also produced delays; but, on the whole, the work went on satisfactorily.

All changes and additions made and extras allowed are stated in detail in a letter from the Secretary to the House of Representatives of February 11, 1885, and in an answer of the present Secretary to a Senate resolution of March 5, 1886. They have been less than could reasonably have been expected.

January 17, 1884, the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs commenced an inquiry with reference to the ships then building. The testimony before them was printed under the head "Additional Steel Vessels," and February 12 they made a report approving the course which had been pursued by the advisory board and the Secretary, expressing confidence in the vessels, and recommending additional vessels, the task of designing and constructing them to be intrusted to the board.

November 20, 1884, the Dolphin's trial trip commenced, but the thrust length of her shaft broke. This led to a careful consideration of the question whether the manufacturers had not failed to reach in the steel shafting the success which had resulted in the steel for the hulls of the ships.

The conclusion of January 15, 1885, was that no risk should be run nor delay occasioned as to any of the ships, and that the new manufacture of shafts hammered from single steel ingots should not be put into the ships, but that shafts built up from scrap-iron should be first used, and the steel shafts so far as prepared should be subjected to severe practical tests, the contractor to allow the Government the difference in cost between steel and iron, and the steel shafts also to be taken as duplicate pieces if they should stand the tests. "This was a fair, wise, and prudent arrangement."

The delay occasioned by the change of shafting for all the ships led the contractor to ask for the release to him of some of the 10 per cent. reservations. These reservations represented work actually done, and on which the United States had a lien for all payments made. The Secretary asked the Attorney-General's opinion as to his right in his discretion to anticipate the time of paying the reservations which were provided for by the contract but not prescribed by the law; and the opinion was that they could be paid.

The naval advisory board approved the payment on January 31, 1885, of five of the ten reservations on each ship, and they were, by direction of the Secretary, paid on that date.

Conferences continued between the contractor and the Department as to the alterations and consequent delays and injury to him which had taken place, and on the 13th of February, on a statement by the contractor that he considered that all equities in his behalf by reason of alterations had been adjusted, the payment of four additional reservations on the Dolphin, Atlanta, and Boston was approved by the board and directed by the Secretary, but no more were paid on the Chicago.

WHAT THE PRESENT ADMINISTRATION HAS DONE ABOUT THE DOLPHIN AND OTHER NEW NAVAL VESSELS.

The Dolphin's trial trip took place on March 10, 1885. It appears from the report of the advisory board of March 17, that the hull and fittings were "strong and well built and in strict conformity with the contract, drawings, and specifications" (except in a few insignificant minor items); that the weight of the machinery did not exceed the contract limit of 430 tons, that it worked smoothly, continuously, and satisfactorily throughout the trial; that the horse-power was 182 less than the 2,300 specified in the contract, but that the board was of the opinion that the deficiency was not due to defective workmanship or materials, but that with better coal and a well-trained engineer force these results would be exceeded; that the mean speed had been 15.16 knots per hour; and the board recommended that the vessel be accepted.

Bear in mind, if you please, Mr. Chairman, that the act of Congress authorizing the construction of this vessel directed that this advisory board should be appointed and required it to see to the building of the ship and to report to the Secretary on its completion.

March 20, 1885, Secretary Whitney in a letter to the contractor notes the deficiency of horse-power, and suggests that another trial be had.

April 7, Secretary Whitney informs the advisory board that as his action in making final payment is one for which he has responsibility, concerning which it is evident it was not intended that he should rely solely upon the advisory board, he has designated three persons to assist him.

On the same day he appoints for that purpose a board consisting of Capt. George E. Belknap, Commander Robley D. Evans, and Mr.

Herman Winter. Was this a fair board? Was it an impartial one? Where is the authority for its appointment? It is not provided for in the law.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is it in the contract?

Mr. GOFF. Nor is it in the contract. Still Secretary Whitney assumes to appoint them for the purpose of assisting him in the examination of the Dolphin. They were constituted the eyes through which the Secretary was to look. They were the glasses through which he gazed, and you will find, I think, that they have magnified most prodigiously.

Captain Belknap is a line officer, a brave and efficient one, but with no special knowledge or experience of naval designing or construction. His promotion to be a commodore, if made, would take place June 2, 1885. His next desire was the high post of Superintendent of the Naval Observatory. While he was engaged as a member of the Dolphin examining board (between April 7 and June 15) he was examined for promotion and passed the medical board. On May 21 he was ordered to the Observatory, and on June 2 he was promoted. On June 15 he reported against the Dolphin.

Commander Robley D. Evans is a naval line officer. He was a brave and efficient one during the war. He had a grievance against the last administration, against the previous Secretary, the one who contracted for the Dolphin. Commander Evans, after over two years of service as inspector of the light-house district of Baltimore, Norfolk, and Washington, had been, on July 14, 1884, relieved from duty and placed on waiting orders by Secretary Chandler. He had through his friends and the newspapers remonstrated against this order, but it had been adhered to. Seven days after Secretary Whitney went into office he, on the appeal of Evans's friends, on March 14, 1885, restored him to the light-house command, ousting Commander Silas Casey.

Mr. Herman Winter is, I am informed, a naval architect; is, I learn, the superintendent of the Metropolitan Steamship Company of which Mr. Dimock, Mr. Whitney's brother-in-law, is manager. The ships of this line have been built by Cramp & Sons; it is a rival line to the Mallory line, whose ships have been built by Mr. Roach. Mr. Winter is to be treated as identified with ship-builders who are rivals of Mr. Roach and hostile to him.

Mr. Winter is also an inventor, and I see he on May 1, 1883, took out a patent for a "power windlass;" February 12, 1884, a patent on a "hawse pipe stopper;" and May 19, 1885, a patent on "steering machinery." The report made by him on the Dolphin found fault with the grip of the steam windlass, declared that the "hawse pipe stoppers" were wrongly made and of insufficient strength, and indirectly praised his own invention, and also condemned the "steering gear."

This is either an unfair board—constituted to be so—or a most unfortunate combination of unfortunate circumstances surround it. God save you, Mr. Chairman, from the temptation and misfortune of like circumstances. Secretary Whitney must have known these facts; did know that Belknap depended on his favor for promotion and assignment to duty; that Evans despised Chandler—hated him with a hate that can never die; that Winter was interested with the rivals of Roach, whose work he was to judge, and personally interested in the success of patents not used by Roach in the construction of the Dolphin. Has this board ever been equaled? Can it be duplicated? It is altogether lovely. Without exception, it is beautiful. After the appointment of this examining board Secretary Whitney began the work of forcing Mr. Roach to agree to further trial trips. Mr. Roach considered that he was entitled, after the contract trial which had taken place, to a decision by the Secretary whether or not the deficiency of 182-horse power was due to defective workmanship or material, and he was willing to receive such decision. He believed that there was no right to ask a second trial, and feared that it was demanded by the Secretary with the preconceived wish and determination of condemning the ship. It seems his fears were well grounded.

On April 7, when Secretary Whitney appointed his examining board, he again asked of Mr. Roach another trial trip. By this time Mr. Roach began to be financially embarrassed, caused by the known hostility to him of the Department in which he had the unfinished contracts for the four ships.

Congress had on March 3, 1885, appropriated $69,201 to Mr. Roach by name for the use of his ship-yard for the ironclad Puritan and for the care and storage of the vessel. This amount Secretary Whitney refused to pay. And, also, he refused to pay him approved bills for extras on the ships amounting to large sums of money. Thus pressed Mr. Roach consented to another trial trip; but the Secretary then, on May 22, informed him that one more trip would not satisfy him; that, in addition to a trial to be had on May 28, "she must be put to a similar run at sea upon such day as you may name. I do not insist upon her full horse-power, or 15 knots-speed, upon this latter trial, if deemed by you too trying upon her new machinery. A speed of 12 knots will answer the conditions under which I wish to place her."

Two unsuccessful attempts were made before a continuous six hours' run was secured. On the first, on May 12, a forward crank-pin became heated about the middle of the trial; on the second, on May 18, an after-bearing became heated before the speed-trial began.

The third took place on May 28, and a six-hour run was made. This trial was a success. The Dolphin stood the test—filled all requirements—and a telegram was sent Secretary Whitney, as follows:

ASTOR HOUSE, NEW YORK CITY, May 28, 1885.

SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, Washington:

Dolphin ran six consecutive hours to-day without mishap of any sort, averaging from seventy-two to seventy-six turns per minute. All conditions very favorable. Steam-pressure from 84 to 89 pounds. Average speed 15½ knots. Speed for two hours, 15.9 knots per hour; approximate mean collective horse-power, 2,240. As ship was aground on reef on Wednesday she ought to be docked before sea trial.

G. E. BELKNAP, President of Board.

This telegram was carefully kept secret, I understand, by express direction of Secretary Whitney, and never saw the light until May 25, 1886, when he answered the Senate resolution of March 6, 1886. It slept one year, all to three days. It would have been well for some men had it never come to light. Better for their reputation had it slept for all time. On June 11 the sea trial was had outside Sandy Hook, and its success was announced to Secretary Whitney as follows:

NEW YORK, June 11, 1885.

SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, Washington:

The Dolphin ran six consecutive hours at sea to-day, loaded to service trim, without drawback, making from sixty-four to seventy-two revolutions of screw per minute; natural draught; no blowers used. Average approximate speed, 12¼ knots as shown by patent log. Approximate speed shown by bearings influenced by fair tide, 13.4 knots. All conditions favorable for trial, smooth sea not admitting of real test as to sea-going qualities of ship. Ship probably can not be docked before early next week.

GEO. E. BELKNAP, President of Board.

This telegram was also kept secret from June 11, 1885, to May 25, 1886. There is no intimation yet of structural weakness, of lack of speed, of defects in stearing apparatus, of matters covered by the patents of Winter. I would take the statement of John Roach on these subjects, risk his judgment, interested as he is, in preference to this examining board all the time, for his life has been a true and pure one, bringing joy and contentment to the lowly and the poor, and fame and prosperity to his adopted country. His life has been a great success, and his integrity is not to be questioned. [Great applause.] This grandest artisan of our country, who has harmed no one and done good to so many, is yet to be convicted by this jury that has heard no evidence and found no fact against him. [Applause.]

In reply to this telegram of the examining board, through its president, Captain Belknap, dated June 11, 1885, Secretary Whitney sent the following telegram:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 12, 1885.

To Capt. GEORGE E. BELKNAP,
President of the Board, New York, N. Y.:

Yesterday's trial was, as you know, wholly valueless.

Why, he knows to the contrary. He has already reported otherwise. But to continue with the telegram:

It occurred without my orders or knowledge. I find that the orders were given here in my absence under a mistake.

Mr. Chairman, he had already given an order that the trial should be made on a day to be agreed upon, and stating that he asked only 12 knots an hour.

To test her strength when subjected to the strain of a heavy sea was the object of her trial. I do not doubt her ability to run 13 knots an hour in smooth water.

She had already made over 15 knots in rough water, in water where sea speed is tested.

I want to know whether she is structurally weak or not.

He does not ask to be advised as to her structural condition, but, suggestively, he uses the word "weak."

Putting her into a heavy sea at a speed not trying to her machinery was the condition you asked for.

Now note what follows:

Has yesterday's trial aided you in determining this matter? If not, require such tests to be had within the next week as you may deem necessary for the purpose. Have the board stay in New York until this is settled. Do this unless you prefer to make your report based on your present information.

W. C. WHITNEY, Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, why do not these dispatches appear in the Secretary's report? The other papers, reports, and instructions do, but not these. It took the power of this Congress to bring the favorable telegrams of the examining board to the gaze of the public. Mr. Chairman, down to the date of this dispatch from Secretary Whitney to Captain Belknap there had not been an intimation in any report or dispatch of the weakness of the Dolphin. The board saw from that dispatch, just as we see from it, the character of the report expected from it.

Mr. STEELE. Are we to understand that the telegrams you read and the statements you make relative to the contracts are official?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir, official from the Department, in reply to an inquiry of the Senate.

Mr. Chairman, no further "tests" were had. The report was made at once. The board, although it had reported that the Dolphin made over 15 knots at a time when 15 knots were required, and that she made over 13 knots when 12 knots were required, although there had never been an intimation as to want of strength and speed, the board on June 15, 1885, made their report condemning the Dolphin because she had not the requisite strength and stiffness, because she could not make the required speed, and because there were "numerous other defects," most of which, the board stated, could be overcome. They base their opinion that the vessel lacked strength and stiffness on the vibration of the engine-room floors and the heating of the after crank-pin, due, as they said, to some changes which had been made after the first trip in the situation of about 45 tons of ballast. Wonderful discovery this wonderful board has made. Vibration! Experts write, skilled constructors teach, that it is a sign of strength when these great iron ships vibrate; that it is evidence of proper construction. When you put on steam and go at full speed you break the machinery, you injure the vessel, unless you have the relief that vibration brings. Experts say that some of the strongest ships vibrate more than those known to be structurally weak. But I must ask you to read their verdict of condemnation and the flimsy pretense on which it is based, and hasten on.

June 17 Secretary Whitney wrote a letter, which he made public, transmitting the Belknap report to Attorney-General Garland. In this letter he declares as a matter of fact, first, that the Dolphin had not reached a sea speed of 15 knots, which, as a matter of fact, was not true; to have reached which she should have shown 17½ knots speed in smooth water, he says; second, that she had great structural weakness, which was not true, and third, that there were other defects which the contractor was willing to remedy and could therefore be dealt with without legal advice. He thereupon states that as the Government was not receiving what it expected and had a right to expect, he desired the Attorney-General's opinion "whether the Department has in the matter a bad bargain simply, which as between contracting parties it must stand to, or has it a broken contract entitling it to insist upon something better. How far is the contractor responsible for the speed, strength, and general workmanship of the vessel, and what are the remedies of the Department under the circumstances." He adds:

I the more willingly avail of the privilege of referring this matter to your judicial judgment and advice lest that in a spirit of resentment at this result I should be unjust.

June 30, 1885, Attorney-General Garland rendered his opinion, which was received by Secretary Whitney on the next day.

First, he declares that the Dolphin should be rejected because she had not the requisite strength and stiffness; the contractor having stipulated that she should be sufficiently strong.

Secondly, he advises that the Dolphin should be rejected because she had less than 15 knots sea speed. He says the act of Congress authorized "one dispatch boat as recommended by the naval advisory board in its report of December 20, 1882." That report recommended "one dispatch vessel or clipper to have a sea speed of 15 knots." The contract had reference to the act, and the contractor was as much bound "to make a ship of the sea speed of 15 knots as though he had agreed to do so in express words."

Thirdly, that there was no "valid contract at all between Mr. Roach and the United States."

And that by the ninth clause, in case of a failure of horse-power the vessel shall be accepted nevertheless, if it appear that the shortcoming was not owing either to defective workmanship or material, it was the "obvious intention" to "relieve the contractor of all duty and responsibility as to the power of the ship and make it feasible to force upon the United States a ship wanting in the prime quality of speed and fundamentally different from what Congress authorized and was so desirous to secure." "What was thus attempted was wholly out of the question."

The contract being an entirety he decides that the illegality of any element "must necessarily vitiate the whole and abrogate the contract."

He concluded, therefore, "that no contract exists between Mr. Roach and the United States;" that the amounts paid him passed into his hands without authority of law, are the moneys of the United States, and may be recovered from him, and that the ship may be held for the moneys.

The principal errors of Secretary Whitney's letter asking the opinion were as follows:

First, his declaration that the Dolphin had not the requisite strength and stiffness. It is true the Belknap board had so reported, but theirs was not a correct finding. The report itself and all subsequent facts show this. And besides the advisory board, authorized by Congress, reported in her favor.

Secondly, his declaration that the Dolphin had not reached a sea speed of 15 knots. She had reached substantially that speed on two trials, one in the sound, one at sea. The claim that she should have reached 17½ knots while a new ship on trial in order to be a 15-knot ship was unwarranted, unheard of before, in the sense used by him.

Thirdly, his assumption that the Department had either a "bad bargain" or a "broken contract" on its hands was an unfair method of stating for decision a judicial question.

I think that Attorney-General Garland was mistaken in the following particulars:

First, the mention in the act of Congress of the advisory board's report, and the remark in that report that the dispatch boat was to have a sea speed of fifteen knots, did not make it a fundamental condition of any contract which might be made that the contractor should guarantee such speed and that the ship should remain on his hands unless she reached it.

Secondly, the decision that there was no valid contract at all as to the Dolphin was, in my opinion, gross error. I venture the assertion that there is not a member of our Judiciary Committee who will so hold, not a lawyer on this floor who will so claim. The ship was built according to designs which by the law had to be prepared in detail by the Navy Department before the ship was contracted for or commenced. The contractor could not have been reasonably required to guarantee a certain horse-power on those designs with which he had nothing to do, but he could only be asked to guarantee good materials and workmanship.

To hold that the omission to require a guarantee of horse-power was a fundamental and fatal defect in the contract, which made it (being an entirety) absolutely void and left a completed war ship on the hands of the contractor worthless to him, while the Government had no claim upon the sureties but must follow the vessel by a suit in equity to charge it with the payments made, was I think certainly erroneous.

The opinion of Attorney-General Garland was given by Secretary Whitney to the newspapers on or about July 12, 1886, and he thus virtually announced that it would govern his action. There had been no mention either in the act of Congress or the advisory board's recommendations of any specific speed except for the dispatch boat. The other vessels were to have "the highest attainable speed." But the clause that the contractor should be responsible for deficiency in horse-power unless caused by defective workmanship or materials was contained in the contracts for the Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta, and on all the four ships there had been paid the contractor $2,125,226.51.

MR. ROACH'S FAILURE.

The public promulgation by Secretary Whitney of the declaration that Mr. Roach was virtually the debtor of the Government for over $2,000,000, to secure which sum the four ships were to be seized and held, in effect, so far as Mr. Roach's financial standing was concerned, added two millions to his debts and practically nothing to his assets. His assets were $4,631,478.23 and his debts $2,262,877.81, as shown by his assignees. The proclaimed addition of $2,125,226.51 to his debts destroyed his credit and compelled him on July 18 to make an assignment and close his ship-yards and machine-shops at Chester, and at the Morgan Iron Works, New York city.

There were thrown from employment by Mr. Whitney's blow at Mr. Roach, necessitated by his assignment, at the Morgan Iron Works, ten hundred and fifty-two men with a weekly pay-roll of $12,358.28; at the Chester Works, eleven hundred and thirty-seven men, with a weekly pay-roll of $11,802.02—$24,160.30. The usual force employed for years before had been, at the Morgan Works, eleven hundred and thirty-one men, with a weekly pay-roll of $14,034.46; at the Chester Works, thirteen hundred and thirty-one men, with a weekly pay-roll of $14,341.20—$28,375.66. During the five years from 1872 to 1876, Mr. Roach had consumed materials and paid out wages amounting to $14,890,147, of which the wages at the works were $7.269,734, and 90 per cent. of the whole amount represents the labor of American workmen.

Between 1876 and 1885 Mr. Roach had built sixty-six steamers at contract prices of $19,345,000; other work amounting to $3,147,000; or a total in nine years of $22,492,000, 95 per cent. of which went for American labor. This information I gather from statements made by Mr. Roach and by his assignees.

ADVISORY BOARD'S CONCLUSIVE REPLY TO ALL CRITICISMS ON THE DOLPHIN.

Meanwhile the advisory board had been trying to get a hearing on the charges against the Dolphin. The Belknap report of June 15 had been given the public and made the basis for destroying Mr. Roach without Mr. Whitney inviting a word in reply from the advisory board. At last, however, in a letter of July 13, the board state that they had seen in the public prints and had unofficially what purported to be a copy of the report and appendix of a board appointed to examine the Dolphin; that they had prepared and placed upon their records a statement in reply, a copy of which they submit and request may be given the same publicity.

Secretary Whitney received the statement, kept it secret, gave it to the Belknap board, they kept it until July 31, when they returned it with a feeble rejoinder, and on the same day Mr. Whitney gave both papers to the public, informing the advisory board that he can but express his surprise that the board should have certified the vessel to him "with so many admitted defects as shown by your report to have existed." This statement is remarkable. There are no defects admitted in the report. Mr. Whitney also in publishing the advisory board's report in his report to Congress omits the letter of transmission and request for publication signed by all the members of the board and publishes the report without date or authentication. The advisory board's report thus treated by Mr. Whitney is an elaborate review of all the criticisms on the Dolphin and a complete and overwhelming reply to them all. The board conclusively demonstrate that the vessel is structurally strong and that she has a sea speed of 15 knots.

All this reached the public after Mr. Roach had been forced to make an assignment—after his great shops had been closed and his grand army of expert toilers separated from him forever.

After the failure of Mr. Roach and the consequent indignation aroused throughout the country, Mr. Whitney abandoned every pretense of acting on Attorney-General Garland's opinion.

The opinion had declared that there were no contracts at all with Mr. Roach. This would have released the sureties and destroyed the liens provided for in the contracts, and would have left the Government no remedy except to sue Mr. Roach for the payments made, seeking to hold the ships by equity proceedings.

Mr. Whitney therefore abandoned Mr. Garland's opinion, which had had its day and served its purpose, and took possession of the Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta, under the contracts, and is now finishing them in Mr. Roach's yard. Official reports made to him show that up to the time of stoppage the contracts had been complied with in every respect and that the ships were all they should have been.

He also took possession of the Dolphin under an agreement that Mr. Roach's assignees should sue the United States for any balance due in the Court of Claims, saying in his report:

If the ship is the Government's design the contractor should be held to correct construction, but not for the performance of the ship.

Thus he reversed the opinion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. Whitney also says in his report:

I have, in addition, taken measures to ascertain and settle the question as to her strength. If she proves well built in that regard the other matters of dispute can be, I think, settled by agreement or arbitration out of court.

The key to Mr. Whitney's whole action since he caused Mr. Roach's failure has been this: to justify and vindicate his conduct and to escape from the public condemnation which has visited him. In this he has shown his conceded ingenuity and resorted to measures so unfair and oppressive as to justify us in calling them cruel and brutal.

In preparing the Dolphin for a sea trial he arbitrarily removed from her Chief Engineer Morley, who was in every way familiar with the machinery, and put on a new engineer who knew nothing of it.

He put on board three so-called experts, who were neither well known nor competent, and who became the laughing-stock of the Navy and of the country.

He sent the ship out in search of a great storm. She encountered such off Cape Hatteras. The seas washed over her deck so severely that the bridge was started, the experts were also made sea-sick, but the vessel remained strong and stanch, and she made good speed.

He suppressed, so far as he could, all announcement of this great success of the ship. He did not allow his so-called experts to make him a formal report, but only to give him a memorandum, which he kept secret. He gave to the public no report from Captain Meade, who was in command of her at the time. His suppression of the facts relative to the speed made by the Dolphin, in his letter to the Attorney-General, is most remarkable, and his claim that the ship had not made 15 knots, as required by——

Mr. HERBERT. Was not Secretary Whitney speaking of sea speed?

Mr. GOFF. I will discuss that in a moment.

Mr. HERBERT. Did that dispatch of the examining board say that the Dolphin had made 15 knots an hour sea speed, to use the language of the contract?

Mr. BOUTELLE. What is sea speed?

Mr. HERBERT. I am asking a question for the gentleman from West Virginia to answer.

Mr. GOFF. The dispatches say "average speed" and "average approximate speed." "Sea speed" is not mentioned, only as it is included in "average" and "average approximate speed." The fact is "sea speed," as it is now used, had not been thought of then.

Mr. HERBERT. Do you mean to say that there is nothing in the contract about "sea speed?"

Mr. GOFF. I do not. I say the construction now placed on those words was not understood at that time in the light it is now used. It is an afterthought.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask you if the contract did not designate sea speed?

Mr. GOFF. Yes; if you make the act of Congress authorizing the building of the vessel part of the contract.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the dispatch say that the vessel had made 15 knots, sea speed?

Mr. GOFF. I have said that it does not use the words sea speed, except——

Mr. HERBERT. That is the difference.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Was not the vessel at sea when she made that speed? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. There are twenty minutes remaining of the two hours.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to be recognized in that time, and I will yield to my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] on condition that he will inform me whether it is the understanding on the part of the Naval Committee that the Dolphin, when she made this 15½ knots an hour, was traveling on the land instead of on the sea. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOFF. I accept the time with thanks. The gentleman's question answers itself, I see.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is meant by "sea speed," by this claim that in order to make 15 knots an hour at sea 17 or 17½ knots must be made on the sound or over smooth water? It is utterly preposterous to claim that such was ever intended or expected of the Dolphin. The advisory board explain what is meant by sea speed as referred to in the law relating to the Dolphin:

As that speed the Dolphin would be able to make in fair weather for a continuous run of more than one day's steaming; in fact, we expected the Dolphin to make the trip from New York to Key West, say, at that rate in good weather. To say that the Dolphin should make 17 to 17½ knots per hour in smooth water in order to make 15 knots at sea is a broad generality, which does not accord with any design or calculation that was ever made on the new vessels or other similar vessels with which we are acquainted. The present recognized standard of speed, and which we see credited to vessels of all navies, is that which they obtain by taking the second mean of four runs back and forth over a measured mile, the turns being made at full speed.

This is the board of which Rear-Admiral Simpson is now the president, not the one over which Captain Belknap presided. The Simpson board reported that the Dolphin could do this, and that her design was such that to enable her to make 17 to 17½ knots would require from 3,300 to 3,600 horse-power, whereas her maximum was only 2,300.

Is it not preposterous to set up this claim now? It is the desperate effort of desperate men caught in their disreputable work; it is "the drowning man catching at the straw." Mr. Chairman, we can not approve of this conduct; gentlemen, we will never build a navy if we uphold it. We must treat the men with whom we contract fairly; we can not afford to be unjust. We should encourage the industries of our country, not discourage them; should build them up, not tear them down.

The Dolphin is a good strong vessel, as grand a ship as dances on ocean's wave. She is the vessel for which designs were made, relative to which the contract was entered into, and we owe it to ourselves, to the Government we represent, to our name and good fame, to correct the misrepresentations that have been made about her, to resent the indignities that have been heaped upon the head of the grand old man who has gone down in order that she may float. As long as the Dolphin is, and long after, will John Roach live. And long before the Dolphin ceases to bear our flag and defend our honor will those who have slandered the ship and endeavored to destroy the man who built her have finished their course, run their race, and been forgotten, let us hope forgiven, also, by those they have traduced, and the country they have injured. [Applause.]

I would rather be in the place, humble as it may be, of old John Roach to-day, without hope, without fortune, but, thank God, not without friends, with the aspirations of his long life blighted, his hopes all wrecked, his home and happiness gone, his household gods all scattered, the light of his industries, the crowning glory of his old age, gone out, than to stand with the "young reformer," the brilliant Secretary, in his imposing marble palace at the other end of the Avenue. [Great applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to submit some remarks upon the pending question for publication in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in submitting to the House the following views on the United States Navy, its condition and its needs, I desire to state that I am indebted for the same to Lieut. Aaron Ward, of the Navy, at present with the Hartford.

THE UNITED STATES NAVY—ITS CONDITION AND ITS NEEDS.

When we consider the importance of our vast commercial interests, the wealth of our seaboard cities, and the extent of our coast line, it seems at first sight remarkable that the decay of the American Navy and the inadequacy of our coast defenses have but lately excited general public attention.

It may be well to notice at the outset the causes contributing to this indifference. We find people who ask in all sincerity what we need a navy for anyhow; others, from interior States, argue from a selfish point of view that a navy is of no interest to them, as it contributes nothing to their protection. Others again, who recognize the necessity of an adequate naval force, will object to present improvement, because, although our civil war found us with a small navy, we improvised a large fleet, and may in like manner succeed in forming a suitable one to meet future dangers.

Because improvements are made so rapidly in appliances for naval warfare that our policy should be to await a solution of the great problems of ordnance, armor, and torpedoes before making a start ourselves.

Or, finally, any decided advance in our naval methods may be deemed inadvisable, because naval officers themselves are not a unit as to the course to be pursued.

To answer these objections seriatim we may say concerning the first that no matter how peacefully we may be disposed we can not hope so to shape our destinies as to be perpetually insured against the evils of a foreign war. When such a war occurs the Navy bears the same relation to the other defenses of a maritime nation as does an army to the fortresses which line an inland frontier and cover important strategic points.

Short of mounting a continuous line of guns from Maine to the Rio Grande and along the whole Pacific seaboard, it is difficult to see how we would do without any navy and maintain in time of war a purely defensive rôle, even of the most approved Chinese description. Shore batteries would not prevent an enemy from holding the broad estuaries of Narragansett and Chesapeake Bays, Long Island Sound and other important arteries of our coasting trade; nor could guns alone prevent the bombardment of any of our seaboard towns if the enemy were present in sufficient force. Both military and naval authorities are unanimous in assigning to the Navy the duty of holding the first line of the country's defenses; and in view of its mobility it is difficult to understand how any successful defense of a long seaboard can be undertaken without a naval armament. Nor is it wise to assume that our part in the event of possible hostilities should be of a purely defensive kind, and we certainly can not attempt offensive movements at sea without a naval armament.

Some of the duties of our Navy in time of peace were enumerated by the Rodgers board in 1881, as follows:

The protection and advancement of American commercial or political interests abroad.

The enforcement of neutrality laws.

The prosecution of hydrographic work.

The maintenance of a training organization of officers and men, and, where practicable, the suppression of internal riot.

Take, for example, the current year. A strong force of vessels and a landing party of twelve hundred men were required to protect American interests at Panama. Frequent complications on the Central American coast have kept war vessels on constant duty in patrolling the waters of the Caribbean and on the Pacific side. We add the Santos case in Ecuador and the recent Guatemala troubles as additional cases in the last few months where force was required to be present at short notice in distant places. Such emergencies no one can foresee, and least of all can they be provided for off-hand. But we are no advocates of a "peace navy," for the principal object of maintaining military establishments at all is to have efficient material on hand for the time of war. The real "peace navy" is the one strong enough to insure our not being caught aback when active operations are required, and sufficiently formidable to make people think twice before provoking unprofitable hostilities.

The fathers of the country have transmitted to us as a tenet of our political faith that we should remain aloof from all possible foreign complications. So far this legacy has been cherished with a reasonable amount of success. But if any one chooses to look back even through the last twenty years of our history he will not fail to notice at least three occasions when our friendly relations with as many different foreign powers have been endangered. Are such difficulties likely to become more or less frequent when our commercial activity, and consequent rivalry with other nations, increases with every succeeding year?

From our fathers also we have inherited the principles of the Monroe doctrine. If the doctrine is a wise one, it is well that we stand committed to all which it implies. But in that case when we are called upon to maintain its validity we shall need something more substantial afloat than spirits from the vasty deep or the paper broadsides of peace societies to maintain our position.

That inland cities or interests would not be affected by a hostile occupation of our seaboard, or by injury to our coast towns, is an argument almost too short-sighted to require refutation. Stop the wheels of industry and commerce in New York, Boston, or Philadelphia, interrupt our seaboard communication, and will the effect on Saint Louis or Chicago be so beneficial as to suggest a renewal of the experiment?

Within the last eight years serious labor riots have occurred in our Eastern cities, the immediate effect of which in paralyzing trade could be counted by hours, perhaps. Was the result favorable or otherwise, even to such distant interests as the farms of Minnesota or the Mississippi cotton plantations? Close but for a week the gates through which our agricultural and commercial products go forth to seek the markets of the world, and our material progress will be impeded, whether we hail from Maine or Texas.

Great as our country is in size, it is greater still in the fact that its widely varying interests are interdependent and that we are by necessity, as well as by choice, a united people. Unconscious as one may be of the fact until it is rudely brought home to him by the sound of a hostile shot, there is no citizen among us whose stake in the country is limited by the four walls of his shop, or office, or by the fence around his front yard.

Those who believe that an improvised navy will always answer our purpose, and who point to the results of the civil war as a proof of their view, may be reminded that the struggle was maintained against a belligerent who possessed substantially no navy at all. What little he did succeed in creating was enough to insure the total destruction of our flourishing merchant marine.

In action against Southern vessels our vast expenditure for an improvised naval armament resulted in the capture or destruction of the few gunboats and ironclads which the South, far less favored with means and material, improvised in its turn. But such capture or destruction was not effected without sacrifice, out of all proportion to the direct result obtained, and finally the improvisers may vote that if we become involved in a foreign war the improvising will all have to be done on our side. But modern naval armaments demand months for the building of a single rifled cannon, years for the production of a modern battle-ship. Suppose we could hire, buy, or borrow the vessels and armament, there yet remains the preliminary practice which is essential to the successful use of modern weapons of precision. To prepare for war in time of peace meant much when it was first given as a parting word of advice to our people; but it means far more to-day when success in naval warfare depends upon practical skill and efficient ships and not upon the mere numbers of the men or the tons borne in a navy-list.

Of patriotism our country has doubtless its full share; but better far is the intelligence that foresees a possible evil and prepares to meet it than the noisy exuberance of unprepared zeal with its tardy millions for an ineffectual defense. If we wait until faultless ships, perfect guns, and unerring torpedoes are produced to create our new Navy, we should no doubt obtain a perfect material; but what will be done in the mean time? No man will pretend that we have yet solved the last problem in any branch of science, that the locomotive has reached perfection, or that the electric-light as now used can not be improved upon; but we do not consider these sufficient reasons for failing to profit by the speed of the one or the rays of the other.

The complaint of the Navy is not that we are a few steps behind other nations in the march of improvement, waiting to come to the front with a rush at the proper moment, but that we are all but hopelessly out of sight astern. In naval matters we have followed a plan which if adhered to would find us without men who could even understand the naval equivalent for the locomotive, much less be able to run it. Our condition would be distinctly better if our service were to-day on a par with that of Brazil or Chili. We should have fewer ships, but they would be of modern types, and the experience gained in such service afloat would bear some relation to the requirements of naval warfare for the next decade at least. The word obsolete as applied in general to foreign vessels of war is distinctly a relative term. Chief Engineer King instances the Dreadnought, a British "obsolete" ironclad built several years ago, which was lately the flag-ship of the British Channel squadron, and an efficient vessel at that, more formidable than the whole American fleet now in commission. With us the word obsolete means that the cruiser of 1885 is a reproduction of the one launched in 1875. The one of that date is but little different and has no better guns than the ship built ten years earlier; and all bear a striking family likeness to the old steam-sloop of 1855.

In other navies the material, form, and armaments of the cruising ship show a more complete change in the last fifteen years than was made in ship-building and guns from the time of the Spanish Armada to the days of Nelson and Trafalgar.

Lack of unanimity among naval officers as to the best means of recreating our Navy is no reason for not improving the service at all. We look in vain through the records of other professions to find advances which in their origin were not the subject of dispute and often of bitter controversy.

Even in matters of national policy, how much harmony prevailed in the Congress that framed our present Constitution? Have we since agreed with absolute unanimity as to the provisions of that instrument? Do we not, on the other hand, find in every walk of life marked differences of opinion, from the varying causes of physicians as to the value of a given operation to the bickering of neighboring farmers as to the best time and means of sowing their seed and harvesting their grain?

And in this matter there is one important point that escapes the attention of critics altogether: The sphere of modern naval operations is so vast, the variety of appliances so numerous, that there is a constant tendency among officers of all navies to devote their spare time to specialties, since one mind can scarcely obtain full insight into all that a navy is called upon to possess and perform. This tendency is a good one so long as it does not interfere with the performance of general-service duties. But the immediate effect is embarrassing, for the specialist, in his enthusiasm for his own particular subject, is liable to underrate the importance of others. A member of Congress hears from one officer that the Navy needs torpedoes to make it perfect; another officer argues with like exclusion for new ships or better guns.

The result is confusing, but the cause, making some allowance for human nature, is a very simple one. We may compare it to the conduct of a party of shipwrecked men stranded on a desolate coast; one of them, who has been injured in the wreck, wants surgical assistance; a second has been cast ashore naked, he cares nothing for a doctor, but would give a year's wages for a suit of clothes; a third, half starved, clamors for bread. The multiplicity of naval requests rightly interpreted means that we really need a fresh start in every respect, as we shall endeavor to show.

The question as to what we most need depends upon a greater question still, one which has been before the Houses of Congress since they were first instituted, and which has remained unanswered up to the present time, namely: What is to be our general naval policy in time of war?

EXISTING SHIPS AND ARMAMENT.

The Navy Register for 1885 gives a list of naval vessels available for commission, omitting tugs and a small iron gunboat, launched in 1843 and cruising in the lakes, we may divide the list into two categories—cruisers and harbor-defense ironclads.

There are thirty-one names of cruisers, but from those should be subtracted at least three, the Tennessee, Lackawanna, and Wachusett, whose days of active service are probably numbered.

In considering the remaining twenty-eight vessels which constitute our entire cruising fleet, it will be interesting to group them by their dates of design; in reality they are all of one class, namely, unarmored broadside sloops of war, with sail and steam power, and all but three are built of wood.

Class I is the veteran Powhatan of 4,000 tons displacement, a paddle-wheel steamer, launched thirty-four years ago, with a coal capacity of 650 tons, daily consumption of 50 tons, at a maximum speed of 10½ knots, which she can maintain for thirteen days. Her battery consists of fourteen 9-inch cast-iron smooth-bore guns.

Class II. Five ships, dating from 1857 to 1859, Lancaster, Brooklyn, Hartford, Pensacola, and Richmond, of from 2,800 to 3,200 tons displacement, ship-rigged, single screw, coal capacity 250 to 350 tons, and able with that supply to maintain their maximum speed of 10 to 10½ knots for nine days in calm weather and smooth sea. The battery power differs, one of the ships being provided with comparatively respectable armament of eight 8-inch converted rifles, the others carry from twelve to eighteen smooth-bore 9-inch guns, and one (or two) 8-inch rifle pivots.

Class III. Three vessels of some 2,000 tons displacement, launched just before the war, or in the early part of the struggle—the Ossipee (1861), Juniata (1863), and Shenandoah (1863). They have single screws and with their full coal supply may maintain a maximum sea speed of 9½ knots for from seven to nine days. The battery power averages six 9-inch smooth-bores, one 8-inch converted rifle, and one rifled 60-pounder to each ship.

Class IV. Two vessels of 1,600 tons displacement, the Iroquois (1859) and Kearsarge (1862), ship-rigged, single screw, coal capacity 200 tons, with which supply they could maintain a maximum speed of 11 knots for about six days under favoring conditions of wind and weather. Battery power, four 9-inch smooth-bores in broadside, two 8-inch converted rifles, and one 60-pounder as pivot guns.

The above list of eleven ships, over one-third of the whole fleet, includes all that may be called ante bellum vessels. Many represent types that were in their day equal to anything produced abroad, but they are now much further behind the requirements of the present than they ever were ahead of the ships of the past.

We next come to vessels built since the war and find relief in contemplating at the outset in Class V the Trenton, the finest vessel in the service, and the only one of its class. She was launched in 1876, is ship-rigged, and with her coal capacity of 330 tons can maintain a speed of 13 knots under favorable conditions for six days. Her battery of ten 8-inch converted rifles and two bow guns (since changed to one 8-inch rifle) is the heaviest carried by any ship in our service.

Class VI. A single ship—the Omaha—launched in 1869. Her displacement is 2,400 tons. This is bark-rigged, single screw, and as refitted has a probable speed of 12 knots; her battery the usual 9-inch smooth-bore with converted rifle pivot.

Class VII includes six ships—Vandalia, Marion, Quinnebaug, Swatara, Galena, and Mohican—of from 1,900 to 2,100 tons displacement; bark or ship-rigged; launched at various times from 1873 to 1883; coal capacity and speed vary; the first three of the class could perhaps maintain 12 knots speed for seven days.

The armament is their weakest point, being in general six 9-inch smooth-bores, one 8-inch, and one 60-pound rifle.

Class VIII comprises eight small sloops of from 1,000 to 1,350 tons displacement—the Adams, Alliance, Enterprise, Essex, Nipsic, Yantic (1864), Alert, and Ranger—the last two are of iron; all, Yantic excepted, were launched between 1874 and 1878. They are mostly bark-rigged, single screw, coal capacity averaging some 150 tons; speed varies. Half of them will do perhaps 12 knots for ten days; the balance may maintain 10 knots for about the same length of time.

Finally, in Class IX we have the iron Monocacy of something less than 1,400 tons, launched in 1865, and of the old double-ender class typified in the late Tallapoosa. This vessel has been practically rebuilt in Asiatic waters, and has performed efficient service there, especially in river work. Her speed is given at 12.4 knots. Her armament, however, consists of old-fashioned 8-inch smooth-bores and two 60-pound pivots.

In looking over this melancholy exhibit the advocate of improvised navies should observe that although the list goes back to the very Noah's ark of steam-marine architecture and comes down to the Mohican of to-day, it contains but two names of ships completed during the late war, the Shenandoah, launched in 1863, and the Monocacy. Of the seven hundred vessels equipped and put in service from 1861 to 1865 these two remain. The millions lavished on the improvising scheme have gone where "pound-foolish" money usually goes, and have left in our cruising fleet little or nothing to show for the outlay.

When we consider the eleven ante bellum vessels with reference to their possibilities under steam, it is important to remember that with most of them the retarding influence of even a moderate head wind and sea is very great. Overburdened with heavy top-hamper they are very far removed in their lines and horse-power from the conditions common to merchant steamers and cruising men-of-war of the present.

Within the current year one of the largest of these older vessels, when approaching a foreign port, experienced a series of fresh squalls which raised a moderate sea between the ship and a mountainous weather shore 3 miles distant. The vessel's speed, under three-quarter power, with thirty-five revolutions per minute, dropped from 8½ knots an hour to 1 knot! The signal man on shore, who had the vessel in plain sight, repeatedly signaled to the town that there was an American war-ship in distress outside. When the wind moderated and the ship reached her anchorage the American consul was preparing to send out a local freight boat to tow in Uncle Sam's lame duck. We may question the propriety of punishing the signal man for giving a false alarm, since he had never seen a steamer before, in such weather, going ahead (?) under steam and making no progress. But we may also ponder over another question: How much good is accomplished by sending the American flag into foreign ports to be the object of ridicule instead of a symbol of power?

The unprofessional reader may realize by a comparison the condition of a fleet such as the one above described. What would his opinion be of a fleet of merchant steamers, one-third of which dated back over thirty years in model and mode of construction? Imagine the Inman or Cunard line as retaining not only the models of the past but as still running the old Scotia and City of Manchester, that were plying on the transatlantic route away back in the sixties, and remember that vast as the change has been in mercantile ship-building, the principles of naval construction have been still more completely changed in the above period. As an instance of our status in construction we note that for at least ten years the importance of all-around fire has been recognized by all naval powers, and many other points have been sacrificed to obtain it, but if we except the Trenton, with its (original) armament of two 8-inch guns firing right ahead and one of the same caliber for stern fire, there is not a single cruiser in the Navy to-day which can pretend to possess such advantage.

True, many of them have 60-pounder converted breech-loader Parrotts as bow-chasers on the forecastle, but as this gun belongs to a class of which two have burst within two years at ordinary target practice it would be unwise to rely implicitly upon the efficiency of this weapon. Nor has our system involved any special economy. Twelve years ago there were on the Pacific station two small wooden sloops, the Mohican and the Scout, respectively American and British. Each was then making its last cruise and returned home to be broken up.

In 1885 a new Scout and a new Mohican appear to replace the old ones on their respective navy-lists. At this point similarity ends and differences begin to appear.

We find the new Mohican a wooden sloop of 1,900 tons; coal capacity less than 170 tons. She has made two passages, one of 1,140 miles with 145 tons of coal, and the other of 1,000 miles on 121 tons. Her maximum endurance would be about 2,000 miles at a speed of from 8 to 9 knots. Her best speed so far has been 10¼. It is doubtful if she will ever make 12 knots. But as a sample of what can be done by a system of reconstruction under the head of "repairs" with obsolete materials and insufficient means for prompt and economical work, she is an undisputed success. Her cost for hull and machinery was over $900,000.

The Scout is a 1,500-ton torpedo cruiser, built of steel, with a light protective deck; coal capacity, 450 tons; speed on her trial trip, 16½ knots; endurance at the highest speed, seven days. Her armament consists of four 5-inch rifles and eleven Whitehead torpedo tubes; her cost, $324,000. If it be objected that the Scout's actual battery is inferior to what could be mounted on the Mohican, we note that the Scout is to be followed by seven others of only 100 tons additional displacement, which will carry fewer torpedoes but a battery of six 5-inch rifles.

The chief point is that this vessel cost but little over one-third of the money charged to the Mohican, and, to make a comparison nearer home, the cost of the 12-knot wooden Mohican was actually greater than the contract price agreed upon for the steel 14-knot 4,500-ton Chicago.

The efficient portion of our cruising fleet, and the only part which it is worth while to keep in commission, consists of perhaps fourteen vessels. Of these the Trenton is easily the first and best, then five of the vessels of class 7, the sixth, the Mohican, being so far behind the others in efficient speed. The Omaha and Monocacy may be accounted fairly good, but not likely ever to be duplicated even by ourselves. Of the eight smallest sloops six are fairly good of their kind—probably as efficient as British gunboats of the same tonnage. Compared with vessels of foreign navies the Trenton and class 7 make the most favorable showing, the comparison being of course made with vessels of substantially the same type and not with very recent ships; with that reservation the Trenton would stand well when compared with any unarmed second-class cruiser launched prior to 1878.

The Quinnebaug and class would compare reasonably well in model and steam endurance with the British Garnet and class, which are the fourth-rate unarmored cruisers of that service. All of the above vessels, except the Ranger, Alert, and Monocacy, are of wood; their corresponding types in other navies are of iron, steel, or composite, the frames of iron, the planking and decks of wood; the strength, even of a composite ship, being one-half greater than that of a wooden ship, while in endurance the vessel built wholly or partially of iron has still greater advantages over wooden constructions.

Steel is, however, the material for modern unarmored vessels—not steel-clads, as many persist in calling them—and except for special purposes we shall find that the use of iron and wood in hulls has been abandoned in foreign-built cruisers of to-day.

If we consider the question of armament, the fatal weakness of the dozen or so of vessels which constitute our real Navy will be only too apparent. With the exception of the Trenton and Lancaster, the broadside batteries of all the other ships consist of a certain number of 9-inch smooth-bores and one 8-inch converted rifle, with the dubious 60-pounder as a bow-chaser. The smooth-bores are of the Dahlgren pattern, and were, in their day, the best guns afloat. The 8-inch rifle is a make-shift obtained by converting the 11-inch smooth-bore Dahlgren.

A comparison of this ordnance with modern requirements for similar weights of gun is made in the following table:

	Weight of gun, pounds.	Caliber, inches.	Charge, pounds.	Weight of projectile, pounds.	Initial velocity, feet per second.	Muzzle energy, foot-tons.	Muzzle energy, per pound of gun.	Penetration of wrought-iron at 1,000 yards (inches).

*At 169 yards penetrated a "sandwich" target of 12 inches of iron, 2 inches of oak, and 8 inches of iron—total 20 inches of iron—and shot continued 2,400 yards beyond.

The table does not give the penetration of our standard broadside gun, the 14-inch smooth-bore. Probably the best expression for that will be found in the reply of one of our Mobile heroes, who was asked what effect the Hartford's 14-inch shot had produced on the 2-inch plates of the confederate ram Tennessee, laid on three deep for the protection of her sides. "Well," said he, "we gave her a broadside at 20 yards, and we might as well have spit at her." Under these conditions a naval officer who commands at great gun drills feels about as usefully employed as though he were teaching the men how to handle flint-lock muskets. Nor is it surprising that one of our best artillerists publicly characterized our temporizing with makeshifts as a "deliberate waste of public money."

To resume. The American cruising navy has some fourteen efficient vessels. All but two are of less than 2,200 tons displacement. Only one of them can steam over 13 knots for a week.

The armament, chiefly smooth-bores, as obsolete for modern great-gun practice as would be old brown Bess for infantry fire; the few rifle-guns immensely inferior, weight for weight, to modern rifles in range, weight of projectile, penetration, and accuracy of fire; the arrangement of the armament of the style in vogue thirty years ago, when rams and torpedoes were almost unheard of, and when vessels went into action broadside to broadside with a couple of pop-guns for bow and stern chasers.

And if we glance for a moment at our ironclad coast defenders we find matters at least as bad. This line of the national defense consists of six single-turreted monitors of 2,100 tons displacement, of a maximum speed of six knots, each armed with two 15-inch smooth-bores. Then come eight monitors, inferior to the first in speed and armament, with either or both of the guns of 11-inch caliber. The turrets of these vessels are from 8 to 12 inches in thickness, without backing of any kind, and composed of 1-inch plates. This defense any modern rifled gun of 6-inch caliber and upward would penetrate at 1,000 yards with ease. Five more monitors of double-turreted type have been for years awaiting completion under a rebuilding scheme.

Of the Miantonomoh, as she is intended to be, we have official particulars. Her turret armor is to be equivalent to 13 inches of steel, side armor 5 to 7 inches iron, deck armor 1¾ inches iron; the four guns to be capable of piercing 14 inches of steel at 1,000 yards. She will be sufficiently valuable as a means of defense to justify completion. Her light draught of 14 feet will make her useful in the comparatively shoal water of many of our seaports. The official report compares her favorably with a British second-class coast defender, the Cyclops, built in 1871, and a Brazilian monitor which dates back to 1875. The Cyclops cost $750,000 for hull and machinery; the Miantonomoh is estimated to cost when completed $1,425,000, exclusive of armament.

NEW SHIPS AND ARMAMENT.

We may discuss further on such causes of our present condition as is may seem possible to remedy, and will now proceed to consider what has been done since 1880 to strengthen our naval force. The Navy at above described is the Navy as it exists to-day, with offensive power distinctly inferior to that possessed by Brazil or Chili, and as a defense materially worse than what we had in 1861.

In 1881 the then Secretary of the Navy, the late Mr. Hunt, convened a board of naval officers, with Rear-Admiral John Rodgers as president, to report upon the needs of the service in the matter of cruising ships, as to numbers, types, speed, armament, and rig. The report begins by showing that for the ordinary squadron duties in time of peace forty-three vessels are required constantly in commission, and that the reserve should consist of not less than 50 per cent., making sixty-five ships in all. Of these thirty-eight were required at once.

The types as selected were, two of 15 knots and 5,873 tons; six of 14 knots and 4,560 tons; ten of 13 knots and 3,043 tons, and twenty of 10 knots and 793 tons.

Five rams and twenty-five torpedo-boats were recommended for immediate construction. No mention was made of armored vessels, as they were considered excluded by the instructions to the board, which called for such recommendations as "Congress would be likely to approve." But a minority report gave importance to the question of armor by insisting that "a modern navy must consist essentially of powerful ironclads."

In the following year after mature consideration Congress alloted for the building of the thirty-eight ships, needed immediately, any unexpended balance under the Bureau of Construction and Repair for building two steam cruising vessels of war. An advisory board of naval officers was to assist the Secretary in deciding how to dispose of this liberal endowment. The board submitted a report which was accepted, with certain modifications, and in 1883 Congress recognized the scheme as proposed by appropriating $1,300,000 for the construction of three cruisers, the Chicago, Boston, Atlanta, and a dispatch-boat, the Dolphin.

With criticisms on the advisory board and on the contractor who undertook to build the above-named vessels this paper has nothing to do. That the board deserve, on the whole, hearty commendation for the attention given to their labors is a feeling too firmly established, in the naval service at all events, to be shaken by any semi-political clamor over real or possible shortcomings. Under difficult circumstances the board has done its best. Not the least of the obstacles thrown in its way was the fact that its labors began in a field absolutely new to any American constructors, either in the service or out of it. Nor was it anything but a positive disadvantage to have the board constituted of officers who none of them held positions in the bureaus of the Navy Department. For the board was forced to be dependent for much of its information upon the Department itself, which necessarily complicated the solution of important questions.

All plans for hulls and engines were elaborated much more minutely than is customary abroad for contract work, especially for engines. There, where long experience has produced eminent firms of engineers, the latter are allowed more freedom of design, being limited chiefly in weight, space, and horse-power required, and receive a bonus for any excess obtained. Here the board may have justly reasoned that in work which was largely experimental minute specifications were necessary; at all events that principle obtained.

Mr. Roach, as is well known, secured the contract for building all the vessels, whose principal dimensions are as follows:

	Chicago.	Atlanta.	Boston.	Dolphin.

Armament:
Chicago, four 8-inch, eight 6-inch, and two 5-inch rifles.
Atlanta and Boston, each, two 8-inch and six 6-inch rifles.
Dolphin, one 6-inch rifle.

Of these the Dolphin is the only one completed and submitted to preliminary test. Whether the trial showed partial or total failure is a matter of comparatively little direct importance to the strength of our fleet. The vessel is simply a dispatch-boat, by no means a vessel of war. If it be true as alleged that the advisory board was in doubt as to the propriety of building her at all at the present time, the result may be accepted as a severe but not wholly undeserved punishment. Imperfections have shown the people at large that we can not expect to enter the arena of modern ship-building with a rush and turn out perfect vessels of war as easily as we can model our specialties of river steamboats and fast yachts. She will be a cheap investment for that purpose.

The Chicago and the sister ships Atlanta and Boston are still "nearing completion," as they have been for many months. All of these vessels are unarmored steel cruisers, and their armament is to consist of modern breech-loading cannon.

From the Chicago a sea speed of 14 knots is expected and an endurance, with 940 tons of coal, of 4,000 miles, at from 10 to 11 knots per hour. The vessel may make 16 knots on the measured mile. The sea speed of the Boston and Atlanta is given as 13 knots or a possible 14½ on the mile; endurance, with normal coal supply, 3,900 miles, at 10 knots.

Several features of the design of these ships have from time to time been criticised with a greater or less degree of intelligence but with unvarying animosity. The type of boiler and engines used in the Chicago, the low freeboard of the Atlanta and Boston, and the maximum speed expected of all three have been the special subjects of attack. If it were possible to make use to-day of the knowledge gained in the last three years' experience we might, for example, lighten the moving parts of the machinery in our new cruisers, substituting steel for iron. This would add to the speed of the moving parts and increase the efficiency of the engines as well as decrease the weight.

A very short time ought to suffice to complete these cruisers; and it is only the part of common sense as well as of common fairness to let them prove their merits or demerits by actual trial.

A single point for the improvisers may be noted here. When the Roach failure occurred this summer, and the question came up of the Government's taking the uncompleted cruisers to its own yards to finish the work no navy-yard possessed the necessary tools for the purpose. Nor was there probably any outside firm in the country at that time which could have done the work required. In March of the current year Congress authorized the construction of four additional unarmored cruisers. A board convened by the Secretary of the Navy to recommend plans for the proposed vessels has submitted the general details of four ships, as follows.

Cruisers A, B, and C are twin-screw steel ships, the gunboat D single-screw and composite. In all the vessels allowance is made for suitable secondary batteries of machine-guns, for protective steel decks, and for water-tight subdivisions of the hull. The cost given includes in all cases hull and machinery only.

When these vessels will be commenced, whether they will be built by contract or otherwise, and, in fact, whether the designs will be accepted at all, are points awaiting a solution which we hope will not be long delayed.

The examples of other powers, the opinions of our best officers, and our previous experience, so far as it applies, demand certain essential qualifications in our future cruising fleet.

Speed.—Our vessels should be at least as fast as men-of-war of equal displacement and character produced by foreign powers. It is not too much to ask to-day that a cruiser of 3,000 tons and upward should develop sufficient horse-power to insure a sea-speed of 18 knots per hour. The term "sea-speed" is applied to speed obtained under favorable conditions of wind and weather, with fairly good coal, and with the regular fire-room force of a vessel in commission.

We believe it a mistake to seek for extreme economy of coal at the highest speed at the expense of economy at lower rates.

The speed of a man-of-war for ordinary cruising purposes need not exceed from 7 to 10 knots. It is at this rate that coal economy becomes an important consideration. The highest speed of the ship would rarely be required for over twenty-four consecutive hours, and on such occasions even an extravagant consumption may be justified to insure the required results.

The Chilian cruiser Esmeralda furnishes a case in point. At her highest speed of 18 knots she burns 200 tons a day; at 8 knots, 18 tons, her coal capacity being 600 tons. She could therefore maintain a speed of 192 miles per day for over a month.

Vessels of from 2,400 to 3,000 tons should make not less than 16 knots as a maximum sea speed, and cruisers of from 1,400 to 2,000 ought to do 14 knots or better.

Handiness is scarcely less important than speed to the modern vessel in battle. A reaction, which bids fair to be permanent, has set in from the system of extreme length and narrow beam, and the shorter, broader, vessels of the present have an immense advantage in turning power over the knife-edge types which prevailed at the outset of fast ship-building.

In all vessels handiness is increased by the use of steam steering-gear which admits of much greater rudder surface than could possibly be operated by hand. We also owe increased turning power to the use of the twin screw which is adopted by all cruisers of sufficient size and draft. Incidentally the twin screw gives greater length of stroke, an immense advantage in a man-of-war, where the machinery must be kept below the water-line and where every inch gained in the restricted dimensions of beam and depth is of value to the designer of the machinery.

Other advantages of the twin screw for man-of-war propulsion are pointed out by Assistant Naval Constructor F. T. Bowles, United States Navy,* as follows:

> If one engine is disabled the remaining one can still propel the vessel at three-quarter speed. The water-tight subdivision of the ship is made easier, and the motive power can not be disabled by injury to a single compartment.

But the point which concerns us specially is that the steering-gear can all be placed below the water-line, and that the twin screws add greatly to the vessel's maneuvering power, enabling her to turn nearly on her center when one screw is backing and the other going ahead.

Draught.—Under this head we may also quote from Mr. Bowles's pamphlet:

> The advantages of large draught are many and important. It is the most valuable and economical direction in which to increase the dimensions of ships, and particularly of war vessels, because the increased depth beneath the water-line renders possible a more efficient disposition of and greater protection to the machinery and greater immersion of the screws. It has been shown that it enables us to obtain forms of less resistance, thus favoring economical propulsion.
> Again, deep draught tends to produce what is of great importance to gunners, a steady ship in a seaway. In view of these manifest advantages, it seems advisable to draw attention to the fact that the Chicago, drawing 20 feet 6 inches extreme draught, can with safety enter thirty-two ports on the Atlantic coast; the Boston and Atlanta, drawing 18 feet 6 inches, can enter only six ports from which the Chicago is debarred, namely, New Bedford, Fall River, New Haven, Washington, Annapolis, and Tampa. If the Chicago's draught had been 2 feet greater she would be debarred from only two ports among the thirty-two, namely, Marblehead and Vineyard Haven, showing that an extreme draught of 22 feet might be adopted as safe, convenient, and advantageous for cruising vessels.

We quote this as applying chiefly to cruisers; for coast-defense vessels other considerations obtain.

Mr. Bowles makes a good point concerning the draught in increasing the steadiness of the ship as a gun platform. We have repeatedly heard foreign officers of different nationalities complain with reference to vessels of light draught and relatively high speed that what with the vibrations of the ship and unsteadiness in a seaway accurate firing was almost out of the question.

Protection.—As to the protective feature of modern vessels, we believe that the unarmed cruiser will prove a more satisfactory ship than either the "cruising ironclad" or heavily-belted cruising ship. The weight of armor is advantageously replaced by increase in armament, coal capacity, and consequent endurance, the latter feature being of vital importance to us who have substantially no outlying coaling stations.

We think that in the near future armor for cruisers will be replaced by the system of water-tight subdivision to an extent hitherto unrealized, that sea-going cruisers will be practically of double hull construction with honey-comb subdivion, and that the interior of the ship will be as complete a system of water-tight compartments as can be devised without affecting the propulsion and fighting qualities. The resulting increase in weight will be provided for by a moderate addition to the displacement, but will in turn admit of lightening the hull, owing to the effect of the bulkheads in stiffening the ship, and the increased rigidity of structure will tend also to check vibrations of the ship at high speed, and thus improve the accuracy of gun practice. To this system of protection as far as it has gone we already add protective steel decks over the vitals of the ship (boilers, engines, and steering gear) and steel shields for the protection of the working guns' crews. Such decks and shields must be sufficiently strong to deflect projectiles from rapid-firing guns.

Other immunity from danger is best obtained by perfecting the vessel's armament. We have profited but little by the lessons of the war if we do not recall the effect of Farragut's "wall of fire" in protecting his wooden fleet from the guns of New Orleans and of Mobile Bay.

Armament.—The question of armament for our wooden cruisers we believe to be already solved on a principle to which this country owes many honorable naval actions in by-gone days. Heavy batteries have always been the rule for our war ships in the past, and that rule is not likely to be changed in the future. In actual numbers our modern armament must needs suffer some reduction, owing to the increased weight of each single gun of recognized efficiency. For this decrease our designers provide by giving to each piece a vastly increased train and consequent greater field of fire. Our ordinary sponson gun is to be the steel 6-inch breech-loading rifle, with a penetration of 11 inches in wrought iron at 1,000 yards.

In addition to these weapons, the pivot-gun adopted for cruisers is a steel-rifled 8-inch, which has a penetration of 16 inches at the same distance. We think that the system of arming a cruiser with several such 6-inch guns and one or more of the larger pivots is infinitely preferable to the opposite plan of concentrating all the weight and most of the chances of success in two or three monster rifles borne by the same amount of displacement for cruising purposes. Such as they are, the rifles adopted can be used with effect against all but the heaviest ironclads, and these are not antagonists which a cruising ship can be fairly expected to engage. A comparison of the requirements for hull and machinery, with the recommendation of the Walker board for the latest new cruisers, shows an encouraging state of affairs in so far as intentions are concerned.

The pending trial of the Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta, if satisfactory, will encourage us to proceed with confidence in rebuilding the Navy upon our own resources and with an exclusive reliance on home talent. But if the reverse obtains, and these vessels prove radically defective in hull or machinery, such a failure may call for a different course in constructing the next group of cruisers. We may then have to consider whether it will not be worth while to pocket some national pride and intrust the construction of one or two model ships to foreigners who know how to build them. In that case the younger men to whom we look for a future corps of constructors will be profitably occupied in watching the work done abroad and acquiring practical knowledge to be applied for our benefit at home later on.

We should not ignore the fact that the Walker board seeks to achieve in a new field results equal to the best attained by foreign builders with their years of experience.

We may instance in point the weight of machinery. The weight per horse-power, in the British Iris, was 326 pounds; in the Chicago it rose to 419 pounds, which, as we have said before, seemed an undue amount, but in the new cruiser, A, the allowance is but 238 pounds per horse-power, or 88 pounds less than the Iris.

Cruiser C, of the Walker board, may be compared to the German twin-screw dispatch-boat Blitz, which it resembles in displacement, horse-power, and speed, as the following will show:

	Cruiser C.	Blitz.
Displacement.....tons...	1,700	1,600
Length.....feet...	230	245
Beam.....feet...	36	32.6
Draught.....feet...	14	13.3
Speed.....knots...	16	16.2
Horse-power.....	3,000	2,808

The allowance in the Blitz of weight of machinery per horse-power is 299 pounds, and for cruiser C, 218 pounds. For the British Scout, a specially light service vessel of 1,500 tons, the allowance is 240 pounds. But there can be no question as to the excellence of the general features embodied in the recommendations of the Walker board. If their proposals can be carried out within the limits of displacement and cost allowed we may hope to see the Navy provided with cruisers that will go, that can fight, and that will not readily sink.

NUMBER OF NEW CRUISERS REQUIRED.

We may safely adopt the standard of the Rodgers board as a minimum. The estimate of this board called for a force in commission of forty-three vessels, and fixed upon seventy as the total number of cruisers needed.

Of the seventy we may now be said to have fourteen, leaving fifty-six to be provided for, and in something like the following proportions:

A. Eight 18-knot cruisers, of from 3,500 to 4,500 tons.
B. Sixteen 17-knot cruisers, of from 2,500 to 3,500 tons.
C. Eighteen 15-knot cruisers, of from 1,500 to 2,500 tons.
D. Fourteen 13–14-knot cruisers, of from 1,000 to 1,500 tons.

To this force of fifty-six vessels we add from existing resources, such as they are, in Class A, one vessel, the Trenton; in Class C, five vessels; in Class D, eight vessels—all capable of performing efficient service for an average of ten years if armed with modern guns. Taking as a guide the price already quoted for hull and machinery of our new vessels, noting also the known cost of the Esmeralda and other modern cruisers, the expense for our entire new fleet complete with all armaments and equipments should not exceed the following figures:

Eight vessels of 4,500 tons, at $1,600,000 each, equal	$12,800,000
Sixteen vessels of 3,000 tons, at $1,000,000 each, equal	16,000,000
Eighteen vessels of 2,000 tons, at $800,000 each, equal	14,400,000
Fourteen vessels of 1,500 tons, at $700,000 each, equal	9,800,000
Total	53,000,000

The squadrons being made up substantially as follows:

Stations.	Class of vessel.				Total to stations.	Total now on station for all purposes.
	A.	B.	C.	D.
Asiatic	1	2	3	3	9	7
North Atlantic	1	2	3	2	8	6
Pacific	1	2	2	3	8	6
South Atlantic	1	1	2	2	6	3
European	1	1	2	2	6	4
Training squadron, Naval Academy, surveying, &c.	.....	.....	2	4	6	6
Total	5	8	14	16	43	32

This arrangement does not provide for a complete reserve of 50 per cent., as recommended by the Rodgers board, the idea being that the number of vessels in ordinary should be kept at the lowest limit consistent with possible demands in the event of war. A vessel never deteriorates more rapidly than when she is not in use, and the smaller the number available consistent with actual needs of the service the better, as the ships can be kept more constantly employed. Nor do the proposed limits of size agree with those recommended by the Rodgers board. A greater displacement than 4,500 tons is not advantageous; the relatively slight gain in battery power and speed does not appear to offset the greatly increased first cost and expense of maintenance of vessels of larger tonnage than the above limit.

On the other hand, the building of cruisers of much less than 1,000 tons displacement we consider a decided disadvantage. The battery power of such vessels must needs be confined to one or two efficient guns. A vessel of some 750 tons requires a complement of officers and rated men as great as would suffice for a ship of double the displacement, though the smaller vessel carries a crew entirely too small to furnish even an efficient landing party. The gain in the economy of fuel on the part of the smaller ship is an advantage more apparent than real. Both a medium and a small-sized cruiser should differ but slightly in consumption at economical cruising speed. At full power, when the difference in coal consumed becomes significant, the object to be attained justifies the increase in favor of the better fighting ship.

We speak here of cruising vessels. Smaller gunboats armed with a single heavy gun and of very light draught for river and harbor service have advantages which are real, though often overrated; but in no sense can such vessels be regarded as a part of a cruising fleet.

COAST-DEFENSE VESSELS.

As Congress has never determined upon a general plan of action for future emergencies, we must needs assume some line of conduct as likely to be adopted in the event of hostilities. We may suppose that our efforts in the line of battle would be chiefly defensive, or at all events that Congress would be very unlikely to appropriate the enormous sums necessary to construct and maintain an armored seagoing line of battle. There are many officers who would consider such a course as altogether undesirable.

On the other hand, at a relatively low cost, we could at once commence to prepare a line of iron-clad defense ships. As coast defenders they must be of light draught as compared with European monster ironclads. Our lamentable lack of docking facilities will also limit the beam of our vessels. To these necessities we may afford to sacrifice some coal capacity and speed; but nothing should interfere with our adoption of the heaviest armor and of the most efficient heavy guns.

If the monitor type, pure and simple, is not adhered to in designing these ships it is believed that the inclined casemate would commend itself to our designers, with turrets placed diagonally at opposite ends of the casemate. Such a vessel in the disposal of her armament would resemble the Boston and the Atlanta, the superstructure being an inclined casemate of deflecting armor and the turret high enough to fire over the casemate battery with their guns in barbette.

It is probable that for one-half of the money expended on the British sea-going Inflexible (nearly $4,000,000) our Navy could possess a vessel for coast service which would carry a heavier battery than the British ship and be at least as efficiently protected.

Side by side with our floating batteries we should develop the type of vessel originated in the Alarm and brought to a greater perfection in the Polyphemus, the torpedo ram, with or without bow-fire. In these vessels high speed, great maneuvering power, and structural strength to withstand the shock of ramming should be combined with as much protection from end-on fire as can be afforded. Here again the inclination of the armor used will add much to its efficiency.

But no intelligent forecast can be made of the exact nature of our iron-clad line of defense until Congress indicates the provision which it is willing to make for that object.

We should be able to pay as much for defending our coasts as will have to be spent to put our cruising fleet in proper condition. Such a sum would purchase complete at least ten Inflexibles and ten torpedo rams of the Polyphemus class, while vessels more useful for our purpose can be produced for the same sum and in much larger numbers.

Whatever may be the course determined on one fact is evident, and to those who rely upon improvising defenses it is not a reassuring fact, if coast defenders are to carry any armor at all it must be reasonably effectual against modern great guns to be of any use. But there is not a single firm in the country to-day capable of turning out a single 6-inch steel plate. It would take our best manufacturers months even to prepare for such a task, and plates of upright armor will have to be at least 18 inches thick to resist rifled guns carried afloat by so-called "second-rate" ironclads. The 38-ton Woolwich, 81-ton Krupp, and, of course, the heavier guns, have a penetration of 18 inches at 1,000 yards. England alone has over twenty seagoing ships with guns of the above caliber and upward.

OUR MODERN ORDNANCE.

Heavy batteries have been usually characteristic of American ships. During our civil war the most powerful batteries afloat were probably carried by our vessels, consisting chiefly of the Dahlgren smooth-bores, to which we have previously referred. These guns among their other merits possessed the great one of being readily cast by any foundry of reasonable proportions, and the castings could easily and rapidly be prepared for service.

With the development of armor the requirements of naval ordnance underwent a radical change. Foreign powers applied themselves with vigor to the construction of guns that might disable the new ironclad squadrons. Our own experience during the war had prepared naval officers for the inevitable change from smooth-bore to rifled cannon. They had seen improvised and scantily protected Southern ironclads defying all but the heaviest calibers of smooth-bores at point-blank range. On the other hand, the Union ironclads when injured by gun fire invariably owed serious mishaps to the effects of rifled cannon.

But the great rifled gun of twenty-five years ago and those produced to-day are as different in accuracy, range, penetration, and weight of metal as two weapons of the same character can very well be.

Fully alive to the necessities of the situation, the late Commodore Jeffers, as Chief of Bureau of Naval Ordnance, repeated annually in his reports to the Secretary, and through him to Congress, the most urgent requests for improvement in naval armament; but with substantially no result. True, appropriations were made for the conversion of some of our largest smooth-bores into rifles by the Palliser system of lining the bore with a steel tube. The resulting guns were, like all makeshifts, an improvement on the original, but of insufficient penetration and range.

About ten years ago the same chief of ordnance made his memorable effort to obtain in the United States suitable material for our first steel breech-loader. Turning to the source of supply from which our improvising friends would derive American weapons in case of emergency, the chief made every effort to secure from our steel manufacturers an ingot of sufficient size for his purpose. The piece could not be completed, "for lack of suitable material," until some two years after it was first designed; and yet the gun was not phenomenal in size or difficult of manufacture; it was only a poor little 3-inch boat howitzer, weighing some 400 pounds. Gun, carriage, ammunition, and powder-monkey, all combined, would not weigh half as much as a single shot from a 100-ton Armstrong, the 71-ton Krupp, or the 81-ton Woolwich rifle! And it took more than a year to find the steel even for this modest début in the manufacture of the rifled breech-loading cannon.

The history of our naval ordnance work during the past six or eight years if ever writen will be a monument to the persistence and energy of a handful of officers who have carried their experimental work to the point of complete success in spite of every obstacle that apathy or ignorance could throw in their way. With scanty appliances and scantier resources the men interested in ordnance work have found nothing so difficult to overcome as the inertia of indifference on the part of their own countrymen.

Manufacturers of steel and iron have done what the limited appropriations would justify them in undertaking to further the advance of our gun construction. But it is manifestly absurd to suppose that these gentlemen will risk a purchase of the costly plant necessary to produce modern gun metal when there is no hope of their ever covering expenses.

In his work on The Establishment of Steel-gun Factories in the United States, Lieut. W. H. Jacques, United States Navy, gives a detailed account of a mission sent to Europe in 1883 (proceedings Naval Institute No. 31), its members constituting the gun-foundry board, composed of Navy and Army officers. Any one who wishes to place the blame for our existing condition in ordnance precisely where it belongs will profit by a perusal of this valuable work.

The gun-foundry board, from the information acquired at home and abroad, recommended steel for the manufacture of heavy ordnance adapted to naval warfare. It recommended further that the steel should be produced by private companies and fabricated by the Government for the Army at Watervliet arsenal, and for the Navy at Washington navy-yard. The figures submitted by the board were:

A.—Approximate cost of plant for producing the tempered parts of guns up to 100 tons ready for delivery at gun factory.

Casting	$250,000
Forging (hydraulic press)	150,000
Rough boring and turning	210,000
Tempering	50,000
Total	660,000
Additional cost, if liquid compression is adopted	175,000

B.—Approximate cost of plant for gun factories.

Guns up to 6-inch caliber	$50,000
Guns from 6 to 12 inch caliber	150,000
Guns from 12 to 16 inch caliber	350,000
Buildings and shrinking-pit	350,000

Three years will be required to complete the tools, construct the shops, and establish the plant. Such a factory will be able to turn out per year fifty 6-inch, seventeen 12-inch, and twelve 16-inch guns, or a proportionally large number of small calibers at a yearly expense of about $2,000,000.

The fact that the United States is destitute of the means of fabricating the modern guns so urgently needed for national defense, and that at least three years will be required to complete the tools, * * * would seem to demand an immediate appropriation of the amount estimated for the establishment of the proposed gun factories.

The report presented to Congress early in 1884 was not acted upon by the House but was considered by the Senate. An amendment to the naval appropriation bill passed at that session directed that the foundry board should reconvene to perfect detailed plans for the proposed gun factories for guns from 6 to 16 inch caliber and to suggest in what annual installments appropriations could be most economically made.

The board in carrying out these instructions finds, as anticipated, that there are responsible steel manufacturers in this country who, although not provided at present with the necessary plant, are willing to construct the same, and to make bids for contracts with the Government for the supply of the requisite material for the heaviest guns adapted to naval warfare if a guaranteed order of sufficient magnitude, accompanied by a positive appropriation extending over a series of years, should be made by Congress. (Report of the honorable Secretary of Navy, 1884.)

At its last session, ending March 4, 1885, Congress failed to act at all on the report of the ordnance board. An appropriation of $500,000 to provide for commencing work on the armaments of the latest cruisers (Walker board), though passed by both Houses, failed to become a law through an alleged "error on the part of the engrossing clerk."

In the mean while work on steel guns for the Navy, chiefly under an appropriation for arming the Chicago, Boston, and Atlanta, has progressed as well as circumstances permit. We have at present finished, or in process of construction, two 5-inch, twenty-one 6-inch, eight 8-inch, and two 10-inch guns. The larger guns are in a backward state, as the forgings must necessarily be procured from foreign makers and have been delayed in their delivery.

The following table * shows the weight of gun, charge, and projectiles for each class proposed:

*General Information Series No. 4, Office Naval Intelligence.

The 6-inch has given a range of over 7,000 yards, at 10° elevation.

The designs for all the proposed rifled guns have long since been completed. The report of the gun foundry board states specifically the minimum time required to prepare a satisfactory plant, and to be dependent on home production alone for our ordnance.

It remains to be seen how much longer people will wait patiently for active operations to begin.

SECONDARY BATTERIES.

Secondary batteries of small, rapid-firing guns have assumed great importance in recent years, not only as weapons of a really formidable caliber and range against unarmored ships of war but because they are the most valuable arm yet produced for the purpose of repelling torpedo attacks. Starting from the Gatling and other bullet-firing machine-guns we have reached the 47-millimeter (1.85-inch) Hotchkiss "rapid-firing" gun, which, with a crew of two men, fires eighteen rounds a minute, the projectile weighing 3.3 pounds and perforating 3.93 inches of steel at point-blank range. The 57-millimeter Hotchkiss fires a 6-pound projectile, seventeen rounds a minute, with a crew of three men, and a penetration of over 5 inches of steel.

Our present supply of these weapons is an American invention, but the Hotchkiss factory is at St. Denis, France. Whether we can rely upon extempore arrangements for suddenly procuring as many of these weapons as we should need in the event of war, is rather doubtful. Owing to a lack of suitable appropriations the new cruisers will be the only vessels entirely supplied with these weapons. A few experimental rapid-firing guns are now afloat, carried mostly by the different flagships in commission. This seems a scanty outfit for instructing the Navy at large in the use and capabilities of the weapon.

NAVAL ADMINISTRATION.

Before any comprehensive scheme is adopted for building up a new Navy the question will have to be settled as to whether all or any of the new ships are to be constructed at the Government navy-yards, or whether the work is to be done exclusively by contract. The quality of Government work has nearly always been superior to corresponding work done by contract, though the cost has been greater and often unnecessarily extravagant. The object of giving out contract work where intelligent supervision will insure proper results is to encourage the enterprise of naval ship-building by private firms. This form of assistance every maritime power is compelled to resort to in time of war, and there is a certain healthy element of competition in building some vessels of a given class by contract work while one or more of the same type are being produced in Government yards. In any case it would be unwise not to reserve some construction work to be done at the navy-yards. We rely upon these arsenals in time of peace for ordinary repairs, which can not be effected without suitable plant and skilled labor. The men and their appliances can not be put to better use when the work of repairs is slack than by having them co-operate in the work of construction.

We assume that the yards will be relied upon, at least in part, for the production of our new cruisers, and we may inquire to what extent existing forms of naval administration are likely to insure satisfactory results.

The present administration of the Department is apportioned among eight different bureaus, namely: Equipment, Construction, Steam Engineering, Yards and Docks, Navigation, Ordnance, Provisions and Clothing, and Medicine and Surgery. In the management of any vast undertaking subdivision of labor is a first principle and, in fact, a necessity. But we do not consider the idea as successfully applied when it produces in a given number of departments as many quasi-independent authorities. That sort of division may be carried so far that each part requires its own special appliances and men for work that could often be done more cheaply and effectually if concentrated in one hand or under one roof. It tends, in short, to a multiplication of parts which renders the business cumbrous and extravagant, just as the principle of independent action when carried too far inevitably tends to conflicts of authority, which may sometimes be amusing, but which are always in the end regrettable.

We hear of a vessel at a navy-yard which requires work under three different bureaus to provide an extra wire and bell-pull for an engine-room gong, of another on board of which one bureau selects a certain locality for side-light screens, a second bureau hitting on the same spot for storing the sheet-anchor, and a third seizing upon the same site to erect platforms for the Hotchkiss guns. A yard-tug is laid up for repairs, her services being actually needed for daily routine purposes; the restoration of the tug to duty is delayed for months because the boiler supplied by one bureau can not be placed exactly in the position prepared for it by another; the upshot being that when the misunderstanding (personal or otherwise) is removed a few hours of labor and a nominal expense suffice to place the offending boiler just where it should have been landed months before. Such small frictions, even if of daily occurence, may amount to nothing in themselves, but they indicate a form of organization which has either outlived its usefulness or outgrown its original proportions.

On this whole subject, and incidentally on our multipicity of navy-yards, we can not do better than quote from the report of the honorable Secretary of the Navy for 1884:

> The bureaus having the supervision of work at the navy-yard are unrestricted in the expenditure for repairs of ships and engines, except by the gross amount of the annual appropriation. The only pretext upon which the existence of our overgrown establishment could be justified was this demand for annual reconstruction under the head of repairs, and hence it is that instead of maintaining such yards, and such only, as were necessary for the advantage and benefit of our ships, the ships have been made to drag out a protracted existence for the benefit of the yard.
> Assuming that the workshops are to be kept open only at the New York, Norfolk, and Mare Island yards, certain improvements in administration are indispensable or any modern ship which may be built at them will be a failure, and any ship built elsewhere which may be sent to them for repairs will be ruined, while both in building and repairing excessive and extravagant expenditure will be made.
> First among the necessary improvements is that reccommended in the report of last year:
> "These establishments must be thoroughly reorganized in such a way as to exclude all political considerations from their management, otherwise bad and expensive work will be the result. We can not afford to destroy the speed of our naval engines in order to make votes for any political party. Whatever other governmental agency may be conducted with partisanship a great naval workshop, dealing with the hull of a modern steel steamship, * * * can not be successfully so managed. * * *
> Until the navy-yard workshops are managed on business principles and without regard to politics the construction and repair of the new American Navy should be committed to those builders who employ or discharge their foremen and all their artisans according to their skill as mechanics and without caring for their political opinions or votes.
> Secondly. A plan must be adopted to fix with certainty the direct responsibility of some one person for the performance of the work. The present system has two defects. The navy-yard is a great naval station, with an admiral or commodore in command * * * the mechanical workshops and the officers in charge of them are under his control and he is supposed to be responsible for what is done. However complete may be the military supervision the technical oversight of the commander-in-chief is usually merely nominal.
> The next defect is of the same character as that which exists in the Department itself, namely, the subdivision of the direction of work upon vessels among the naval constructor, the chief engineer, and the equipment officer, and none of them under any control on the spot except that of the line officer who commands the naval station. Under these circumstances unity of action and effective direction and superintendence in the building or repairing of a ship are impossible. The remedy for these defects must be found in placing one technical head—a competent ship-builder—over all the persons engaged in building or repairing the ship, over the work on the hulls, machinery, and equipment. The difficulty of finding within or without the naval corps persons fit for the service required * * * is recognized. But they must be found, if the Government workshops are to be worthy of the name.

The report further recommends that the supervising naval constructor at each of the three working yards, shall be under the direct supervision of a chief of Bureau of Naval Construction at the Department, leaving all military control at the yards in the hands of the commandants as heretofore, and further says that if such reform as recommended are not practicable, "it would be better to discontinue our yards for all working purposes, and not only build but repair our vessels and engines by contract."

Going a step further, and in the direction pointed out by Commander B. H. McCalla in his report on the Panama expedition of 1885, we should hope to see at the Navy Department a central office—

> The chief of which having received a military education, and being thoroughly cognizant of the intentions and desires of the Secretary, should be held responsible for the technical details necessary to fit out an expedition or ship in the most efficient manner. Under the present system the chiefs of half a dozen bureaus may overwhelm the commanding officer of an expedition or the commandant of a station with confusing telegrams, thereby causing delay or possible failure.

These reflections were applied chiefly to expeditions or ships, but the whole principle may be advantageously extended to group the construction and military features of our establishment as much as possible under separate and responsible heads. Such an organization would place in the Department, as adjunct and professional advisers of the Secretary, a constructor-general on the one hand, and a chief of the military branch on the other. The latter, under the direction of the Secretary, would have charge of the movements of squadrons, the personnel of the Navy, and, in general, of all operations, and be with reference to the Navy what the Adjutant-General is to the Army. The former would assume direction of everything appertaining to hulls and machinery, yards and docks, and equipment.

The specialties of ordnance, navigation, provisions and clothing, and medicine and surgery could form appropriate subdivisions under a well-defined limitation of their respective powers, and with a reference of their doings to the Secretary and to either or both of his technical assistants in so far as their actions could be affected. A single accountant-general, to whom all returns of receipts and expenditures are made, would advantageously replace the eight financial clerks required under the existing system. The new plan would substitute for eight different heads of departments two technical advisers, whose respective duties and responsibilities can be very sharply defined, with four heads of divisions upon whom the Secretary could call when necessary for information in their specialties.

Under some such system as the above we may expect to see the work of navy-yards and the general business of the Department conducted on principles that will insure harmony of action and effective results. The idea of depending on an admiralty board for administration work is distinctly less promising than the above plan, whether the said board be independent of Department offices or formed by confederating the chiefs of the existing bureau system. On this point the opinion of one of the most valuable officers that the Navy ever had can not fail to be of weight. Real-Admiral Jenkins, during a recent discussion of the Naval Institute, spoke as follows:

> I am, and have long been, of the opinion that boards should not be called upon to administer anything. They are extremely useful for the purposes for which they are chiefly convened, but for carrying out their own recommendations after they have been properly accepted and approved, a professional expert of large experience and undoubted ability is, to my mind, an indispensable factor to success. Divided individual responsibility, as is the case where boards are required to carry out their own plans, much oftener results in partial, if not complete, failure than when the whole care and responsibility are placed in the hands of one person. Failure with the one responsible officer, if failure there should be, is his failure alone. Not so with a mixed board, for then the responsibility is divided and no father will ever be found to assume its paternity.—Proceedings Naval Institute No. 32.

TORPEDOES.

Torpedoes are either offensive or defensive. The former class includes all forms of submarine mines which are intended to close a seaport against an attacking squadron or to obstruct a hostile fleet in its movements through channels and fairways which may be of sufficient importance to require protection.

This branch of the national defense, the placing of submarine mines, is intrusted in the United States to the Engineer Corps of the Army. It is noticed here incidentally and only to dispel the illusion cherished by many that the defensive torpedoes if used in sufficient quantities will keep a hostile fleet from our shores. The experience of our own civil war should have taught us that the presence of mines alone, and especially of improvised mines, was never an insurmountable obstacle to the movements of the Union vessels.

The defensive mine must be fitted either to explode on contact with a vessel or else with electrical connection by cable to a shore station, from which the torpedo is exploded at the will of the operator. The former mine has the disadvantage of being dangerous alike to friend and to foe. Its presence seals a harbor more completely than any blockading squadron could do it, and if it breaks adrift from its moorings it is a further menace to friendly vessels. If fitted so as to become harmless as soon as it breaks adrift, a favorite American type, it is then, if no longer a danger to friends, at least a useless form of defense.

parative impunity if not under cover of guns, and a passage-way can be cleared through such a defense by grappling, countermining, or exploding the mines with torpedo catches and the like. The electric mine must obviously also be under the protection of batteries or the enemy can shell and destroy the station of the operator and grapple unmolested for the connecting cables, which, when found and cut, render the mine useless.

An additional form of purely defensive torpedo to which particular attention has been given in this country is the controlled torpedo. This is usually a spindle-shaped boat, carrying in its bows a suitable charge of explosive and fitted with engines and propeller and steering gear. The engines are run by compressed air, carbonic acid gas, &c., stored in reservoirs in the boat, or by electricity supplied to a motor in the boat from a shore station through the medium of a cable. The movements of the torpedo are controlled, in all the types, from the shore by a wire carrying a current which is directed at the will of the operator so as to start or stop the engines, alter the position of the helm, or fire the torpedo. The operator must at all times know the position of the torpedo, and this is effected by fitting the weapon with two range poles projecting above water which indicate its whereabouts. Lights, screened from the enemy, are mounted on the range staffs for night work.

This form of weapon may be formidable in the defense of harbors, although its range is limited by the ability of the operator to follow its movements, and it is not likely to be practically effective at distances exceeding one mile. In any case, the station of the operator will require the same battery protection as is necessary for all torpedoes operated from a shore base.

So far no torpedo of this description has been found available for naval use, as the type can not be handled from a boat or vessel under way.

The marine torpedo outfit of all naval powers, except the United States, consists at the present time of two forms of weapon, the outrigger and the automobile torpedoes.

The outrigger torpedo is the simplest and for many purposes the best of offensive torpedoes carried afloat. It consists of a spar rigged out from a boat or vessel and bearing at its outer end a charge, fitted to explode on contact or by electricity, at the will of the operator.

The explosive generally used in all forms of naval torpedoes is gun-cotton, a reasonably safe, cheap, and effective substance. The case in which it is confined may be reduced to the lightest weight consistent with holding the charge together, and the introduction of this explosive has consequently done away with the cumbrous and unwieldly iron shells which constituted the envelope of the old gunpowder torpedo. The modern gun-cotton torpedo weighing less than 70 pounds is more effective than the old ship-torpedo, whose weight complete was over 350.

We here reach a point at which Uncle Sam can be at least found "on deck," to use the current phrase. We have spars, and probably as good a form of spar-torpedo as any afloat. We have a recently established Government gun-cotton factory which turns out as good an article as any yet produced, and by this time there probably exist enough gun-cotton outfits to equip completely as many as a dozen of our vessels of war.

But how we propose to carry the new weapon around is not quite clear, unless we are to rely upon harbor tugs, or those abominably noisy craft, the poky steam-launches of our men-of-war. These boats are indeed fitted with the usual spar attachments, but nothing in the nature of bullet-proof shields, or shelter even from the descending column of water after explosion, is yet supplied for any of them. In a modern torpedo attack their noisiness would betray them from afar, and their lack of speed would seriously jeopardize any chances of success after their first discovery, in these days of machine-guns and rapid-firing small-arms.

The United States also adheres to the spar torpedo as a supposed defensive weapon for its cruisers; weapon of offense it could scarcely be, for no American vessel carrying it to-day, the Trenton alone excepted, could get within hailing distance of a foreign antagonist of equal tonnage, unless the latter were disabled or should seek close action for her own purposes.

The torpedo owes its origin to an American, Bushnell, its first noted public success to another, Fulton, and its general use in warfare dates from our civil war. Since that time we have been content to travel in the path of progress at the seven-knot speed of our steam-launches and accept the length of a torpedo spar as a sufficient distance for looking beyond the ends of our noses. Other nations, however, have not been satisfied with any such rate of progression or circumscribed horizon. All European naval powers and other nations with navies, while retaining the spar topedo, have spared no pains to increase the range of the torpedo as an offensive weapon and to insure its rapid transportation. The necessary disadvantage of the ordinary spar torpedo is that the boat carrying it must be brought almost in contact with the hostile ship to insure a successful explosion. To obtain equally good results from a reasonable distance other nations have turned their attention to a form which should be quite as portable as an outrigger torpedo and practically lengthen the spar by a distance corresponding to the effective range of the improved weapon.

Mr. Whitehead's torpedo is the most satisfactory solution of this problem up to the present time. It is a fusiform submarine boat with engines, screws, and rudder, and carrying a supply of power in the shape of compressed air. This boat carries in its bow a magazine of gun-cotton which explodes on contact. The torpedo is ejected from a ship or boat through a torpedo tube by compressed-air pressure. On leaving the tube it takes up a motion due to its own engines and power, and travels through the water at a constant depth, determined beforehand by the operator. Two special fittings, a hydrostatic piston and a pendulum, serve to maintain this constant immersion—when the torpedo tends to alter its depth the piston acts against this tendency by its effect on suitable diving rudders, the pendulum serving as a regulator for the piston to prevent extreme variations.

This torpedo has been adopted as a service weapon by all European naval powers, by several of our South American neighbors, and by China and Japan.

We are the only nation whose immense seaboard remains up to the present time entirely unprotected by any device of this kind, although our countless creeks and rivers and net-work of inland navigation afford the most desirable basis of operation for directing such torpedoes offensively against an enemy hovering on our coasts.

The cause of this apathy must be found elsewhere than in the naval service. Year after year the report of the naval Chief of Ordnance has urged the acquisition of this weapon as the only existing practical solution of an important naval problem; and he has urged in vain. Assuming that a portion of this indifference is due to doubt as to the value of the torpedo, it may be well to consider its alleged merits and defects.

To argue that the Whitehead is unacceptable because it is not an American weapon is to dispute the efficacy of the modern breech-loading rifle and of the compound engine on analogous grounds. The Whitehead, made in Austria by an Englishman, and the idea of which originated with an Austrian artillery officer, is no longer the invention nor the special weapon of any nation, but an international arm of offense, common to all but ourselves. Moreover it happens, curiously enough, that the especial form of Whitehead which is most favorably reported upon is not the one turned out at present by Whitehead himself, but by a rival manufacturer in Berlin, the latter using phosphor-bronze for the material of his torpedoes instead of steel, thereby obtaining freedom from rust and deterioration, while the other qualities are said to equal those possessed by the best Whiteheads proper. Certainly, if any one in America can produce an offensive topedo as portable as the Whitehead and as effectual, let us have it by all means in preference to the work of a foreigner, but the acquisition of worthless experiments will be more costly to us in time lost even than in wasted money.

It is urged against the Whitehead that it has never made its record in battle. The first one ever used in action was discharged by H. M. S. Shah against the Huascar, when the latter was in the hands of Peruvian insurgents in 1877. The torpedo failed, and is said to have been unable to overtake the hostile ship. It is fair to remember that this was one of the earliest types of Whiteheads. Its highest speed for what would now be considered short ranges was not to exceed 10 knots and its accuracy was far inferior to the practice made by the modern torpedo of the same dimensions. If we reject the principle of an automobile torpedo on the score of this failure, we might on equal grounds refrain from using modern sewing-machines because the earliest invention was cumbersome and liable to get out of order.

We next find the Whitehead as a weapon in the hands of the Russians during the Russo-Turkish war. During the whole war only five or six were expended, two were lost in practice, and three (or four) used in service, as follows: Two were discharged on the night of December 27, 1877, in the harbor of Batoom by Russian torpedo boats at a Turkish vessel of war. The ship escaped injury, and both torpedoes were picked up on the beach next day, one with the magazine gone. Hobart Pasha, in the North American Review for November and December, 1877, states that the safety-pins were not withdrawn from the firing apparatus before discharge. Moreover, we notice in other accounts of the attack that one torpedo was towed into the harbor suspended below a raft, and the other discharged from a frame at the side of a boat, a mode of discharge modified in existing torpedo-boats; also that the Turkish ships presented a poor mark, being bows on to the attack.

The next and only other attempt to use the Whitehead in battle occurred in the same harbor of Batoom on the night of January 25, 1878, a Whitehead (some say two) being discharged at a Turkish vessel at 100 yards range, sinking her immediately. Whether these results are considered favorable or not to the Whitehead, they offer special food for reflection to American critics. For we learn that the Russians received their supply of Whiteheads at the outbreak of hostilities precisely as our Navy would be likely to receive them if we kept on waiting Micawbar-like for "something to turn up." But that is a bad time to commence scraping an acquaintance with a Whitehead. No farmer would run the risk of transferring his hired hand, at a day's notice, from the handling of a flail to the superintending of his latest thrashing-machine, and one is no more likely to find afloat than ashore men capable of understanding all the intricacies of a mechanical production at a day's notice. The Whitehead is a machine, and while its adjustments have been much improved and simplified of late years, it can only be handled successfully, like any other mechanical contrivance, by those who know its peculiarities through constant and careful practice.

Those who should be best informed on the capabilities of the Whitehead consider its positive value as dating from 1880, and it was in the same year that the first successful form of ejecting tube for boats was devised and tested.

We may notice some of the published results obtained by different nations First, as to the possibility of losing the weapon in practice. M. Charmes states * that the French torpedo vessel, the Japan, discharges some two hundred torpedoes per month without ever losing a torpedo, and concludes that if any are lost elsewhere it is from lack of practice on the part of the officers and men. He also takes the liability (which in service is not limited to torpedoes) of charging all errors and mistakes on the part of the operators to imperfection in the torpedo. In the case of the Japan her practice is conducted underway or at anchor in good or bad weather, and either at a movable or fixed target, and always with a certain degree of success. In her latest practice while under way, firing at a movable target, the deviations of the torpedo have been so slight that 95 per cent. of the torpedoes discharged would have struck a vessel 210 feet long, at a range from 250 to 400 yards.

The ordinary torpedo practice of British cruising ships includes firing from the (modern) side frames of their steam-launches at a space between two buoys placed fifty yards apart from a range of 400 yards, and the writer has been recently assured that in the case of a vessel under discussion the mark had been missed but three times (one missfire) during a three years' cruise, the practice being held once a quarter, at which time four runs are usually made.

Out of sixty runs made at Kiel, Germany, a short time since, the mean error in direction in a range of 400 yards was only 24 yards, and the depth was within a small decimal of what the torpedo was intended to maintain.

But as the precision of the Whitehead under reasonably favorable circumstances can be no longer disputed, it is held by some that it is too delicate, too liable to get out of order, to stand the rough handling of the service. Apart from the fact that it has now been carried and used in practice for years by the ships of different navies we may instance in reply the the case of a German torpedo which at the end of a run was taken from the water and put in store without previous cleaning, was left there through the winter months and was successfully run in the spring without overhauling. We may further note that during certain Russian maneuvers the Russian vice-admiral had gotten under way to seek out the enemy's squadron and passed within 200 yards of some fishing boats, when the flagship was struck with a Whitehead and declared out of action.

The torpedo had been discharged from one of the fishing boats by a party of three officers of the opposing squadron disguised as fishermen. So this delicate machine could be stowed away in an ordinary fishing boat and be successfully discharged with a jury rig of some kind, though it may be too fragile to trust in a suitable torpedo room and to be handled successfully from approved appliances. A pertinent question would be, how many modern small arms would have stood successfully the test applied to the first of these torpedoes and how could even the smallest rifled cannon have been concealed and used with effect as was the case with the second torpedo. Mr. Charmer pointedly remarks that the chief objections to the automobile torpedo have emanated from France and England, the greatest of maritime nations, which seem to feel instinctively the dangers to which this revolution in naval warfare exposes them.

Austria, Russia, Italy, and especially Germany, the more recent naval powers, less fettered by tradition and conservatism, are ardent supporters of the modern torpedo system, and use every effort to perfect that branch of their naval service. Germany allotted in one year nearly one-fourth of her naval budget to her torpedo system. France and England, which can not afford to be left behind, offer in their great military harbors a daily scene of activity in the matter of torpedo practice, which is a constant source of surprise to many of our naval officers, and an object of envy to all of them who witness it.

The following table will give some of the essential particulars of the so-called 14-inch British, the Whitehead proper, and the Berlin (Schwartzkopff) type of existing locomobile torpedoes:

Patterns.	Length.	Diameter.	Weight complete.	Speed in knots for—		Weight of explosive.
				200 yds.	600 yds.
	Ft. in.	Inches.	Pounds.			Pounds.
British No. 1	14 6	14	525	25.5	20	44
British No. 2	14 7	14	575	.....	22	46½

* Revue de Deux Mondes, December, 1886.

A knot is 1.153 statute miles, and a speed of 25 knots represents, therefore, a speed of 28.82 statute miles. The latest German 14-inch torpedoes have enough motive power to run a total distance of 4 knots.

	Whitehead.	Schwarzkopff.
Maximum horizontal deflection at 400-yard range	±24 ft.	± 23 ft.
Maximum vertical deflection at 600-yard range	± 9 in.	± 8 in.

A few years ago Whitehead offered to sell to the United States five torpedoes of different patterns, with working drawings and the right to all future improvements, for $95,000. The cost of subsequent single torpedoes would be about $1,500 each.

Whitehead himself supplies wholly or partially nearly all nations except Germany and Spain, but many countries have in addition manufactories of their own. The service range of the weapon is from 50 to 600 yards, although it can run up to 1,000 yards at a speed of 18 knots.

It has been estimated that at the close of 1883 upward of three thousand Whiteheads were in the hands of the different naval powers, and great additions have since been made to the supply, Germany having included four hundred in a single order.

TORPEDO BOATS.

Of importance scarcely secondary to that of the Whitehead itself is the subject of the modern torpedo boat, built to carry the automobile or spar torpedo. If the Whitehead now enjoys a complete monopoly as the naval offensive torpedo for use on shipboard and bids fair to drive out the spar torpedo altogether in smaller craft, the boats themselves have revolutionized the art of miniature ship-building in many important particulars. As none of these boats have appeared in United States waters a brief description of them may not be out of place. Their length is from 60 to 80 feet for the smaller types and from 90 to 125 for the larger "cruising" boats, built of steel, very low in the water, of high speed, and fitted with noiseless engines, and of great maneuvering power. Strong in construction, they are abundantly secured by water-tight compartments from all ordinary casualties. Two years ago two of these boats collided nearly end on at full speed in the harbor of Naples. The bow of one boat was nearly torn off, but her collision bulkhead held and both boats reached the naval arsenal in safety. Who that has ever seen these quiet imps of destruction gliding about in foreign waters can fail to realize what a tremendous change their development has effected in the conditions of naval warfare?

To quote again from M. Charmes:

> As long as the Whitehead was carried on board of ironclads whose range of artillery fire prevented approach at sufficiently close quarters to bring the torpedo into play, it could be claimed that this weapon would be a secondary character. Carried by modern torpedo boats along the coast or at the entrance to harbors the torpedo became a terrible weapon. Out of sight of land there was still for a time some doubt as to its successful employment. This illusion may have existed until April, 1884, when, for the first time, cruising torpedo boats appeared in our (French) squadrons, capable of holding the sea in any weather and of making long voyages. Already English-built boats, destined for Greece and for some of the South American states, had gone from England to their distant home ports without convoy and without accident, although not without experiencing heavy weather. The two squadron torpedo boats Nos. 63 and 64, built by M. Normand, had also successfully performed the journey from Brest to Toulon. But these were not public experiments and little attention was paid to them. A different result was obtained when these above-named torpedo boats got under way in the Mediterranean squadron in April, 1884.

Mr. Charmes then relates at length the experience of the squadron, which has since become well known through the public press. With a rapidly freshening breeze the sea became so heavy that two ironclad coast-defense vessels were compelled to seek shelter, while the torpedo boats successfully weathered the gale in company with the rest of the squadron. What is less publicly known is that these boats continued with the fleet during its entire cruise through the western part of the Mediterranean, taking only such precautions in heavy weather as would be common to all but the largest type of cruising ships. The test was complete, and it may be asserted from the experience of these vessels and of others of the same class, one of which has recently gone unattended from England to Australia, that the largest torpedo boats will keep the sea in any weather, and are in fact, as well as in name, "cruising" boats. The smaller craft, or harbor boats, have weatherly qualities which are not to be despised, but are not provisioned or otherwise supplied for extended service at sea, nor are they intended for such service. The very smallest class are required to perform their duties in such weather as would be practicable for ordinary steam-launches, and they more than fulfill this condition.

As to the probable value of these boats for offensive purposes there can be no reasonable doubt. Current service literature teems with authenticated instances of successful approaches made by them upon a supposed hostile squadron, and without discovery; and the conditions have invariably been far too favorable to the defense. The boats have left their squadrons at a certain hour; it has been known that their return must occur between certain limits of time and of direction. No experiment has yet shown conditions approximating to those of actual warfare. Two or three boats have made a sham attack on as many ironclads, when in reality the attack should not even be attempted by less than three or four of these pigmies to each vessel. The crews of the defense vessels, instead of being worn out by previous vigils and false alarms, have been collected en masse to spy out the movements of their enemies for a few hours at the utmost; and the electric light has been utilized under the most favoring conditions. And yet the success of the torpedo boat in approaching unobserved has been simply marvelous.

Many have held that when the torpedo boat is once sighted, its destruction by modern machine-gun and small-arm fire would be all but certain. The practice made by Her Majesty's gunboat Medway has been instanced in support of this view. In reviewing her experiment we find that as the Medway approached "end on" at a speed of 8 knots a target representing a second-class torpedo boat, she opened fire at 560 yards, ceasing fire at 80 yards, and in the two minutes thirty-five seconds of the run firing one hundred and thirty-five shots and making one hundred and fifteen hits. There is no question but that such a fire would annihilate a torpedo boat in actual practice; but it may be asked how many of these fifty-four shots a minute were fired inside the ordinary White head range? Why should the Medway have two and a half minutes' time allowance for covering the distance of 480 yards, when a second-class boat would have approached the Medway a like distance in a little over one minute?

Finally, what practice would the Medway have made at night with or without the doubtful assistance of the electric light, and where would the consorts of the dummy boat have been in actual warfare while all these shots were being poured into their companion and most of the attention given to her. The machine-gun is certainly the best defense yet produced for modern vessels against their new assailants, but the gun has not yet the best of it by any means. "Bantry Bay" is the latest experience quoted by anti-torpedo men against the torpedo in general and the torpedo boat in particular.

But the point is not a strong one. The results of the recent maneuvers at Bantry Bay show that when a powerful fleet has absolute control of a comparatively small sheet of water, and has abundance of time and of materials for perfecting its defense, it can impede the direct attack of torpedo boats (until the boom has been broken through), and by bringing upon the attack the combined fire of ships, batteries, machine-guns and flanking batteries on shore, aided by vidette boats outside of the main defense the assailant may be successfully repelled. It scarcely required such an outlay to prove that proposition. A dozen torpedo boats with a handful of men are not yet supposed to move in actual warfare upon an enemy's fleet when every single condition favors the defense, and the very fact that such a fleet should require, for successful protection against these modern sea hornets, more elaborate preparation than any British fleet ever made in battle to repel hostile attack, should prove, even if the tiny adversaries were worsted, that they were not to be despised.

A single point brought out in the Bantry Bay maneuvers against the Whitehead deserves passing notice. The Polyphemus, moving at a high rate of speed, was reported to have escaped contact with a number of Whiteheads, all of which should have hit her, though some of the ranges were rather long. The writer has suggested as a possible cause of this immunity the high speed of the vessel with a consequent wave motion which may have deflected the torpedoes. Assuming this to be true it would be the most serious objection yet urged against the Whitehead, and would diminish its sphere of usefulness to that extent, but to that extent only. For against hulks towed at a moderate speed its success has been all that could be desired, and against stationary vessels without cumbrous exterior defenses all but certain.

The following gives some particulars concerning recent torpedo boats of different manufactures:

1880—Russian boat, the Batoom, built by Yarrow; length, 100 feet; beam, 12 feet 6 inches; draught, 4 feet; speed, 22.16 knots; horse-power, 500; revolutions, 392; steam, 119 pounds; coal supply, 5 tons; endurance, at 10-knot speed, 450 miles.

In 1881 Yarrow followed up this boat by another, also 100 feet long, built for Italy, and which attained a maximum speed on trial of 22.46 knots, or nearly 26 statute miles.

1883—Russian boat, the Lucknow, built by Thornycroft; length, 113 feet; beam, 12 feet 6 inches; depth of hold, 6 feet 6 inches; draught, aft, 6 feet; displacement, 60 tons; armament, 6 Whitehead torpedoes (with two ejecting tubes), and two Hotchkiss guns. Mean of six runs, at load draught over measured mile, 19.49 knots; mean speed for 3-knots continuous run, 18.96. She would steam with her full coal supply 1,000 knots at 10.8-knot speed.

Thornycroft built almost a sister boat for the Australian Government. Her supply of coal of 10 tons would carry her 1,270 knots at a speed of 11½ knots.

1884—The latest German boat reported as attaining a maximum speed of 20½ knots during a five-hour continuous run at load draught, this being the highest speed for prolonged running yet attained.

1885—Yarrow is building for Austria two boats to be 135 feet long, 13.75 feet beam, to develop 1,100 horse-power, and have a speed when light of 25 knots, and of 22 knots when loaded ready for service.

1885—One of six Turkish torpedo boats, built by the Forges et Chantrers Company in France, made a trial trip in April, and at her load displacement carrying twenty-four persons, made 20.3 knots over the measured mile. Dimensions of the boat length, 101.7 feet; beam, 11.7; draught, 5.7; displacement, 42 tons; fittings are two Whitehead bow tubes, and in addition a spar for outrigger torpedo.

In a valuable report on torpedo boats made to the Secretary of the Navy by Lieutenant Very in August, 1884, there occurs a quotation from a report to the German Reichstag, made by a board of naval officers in the spring of 1884, as follows:

> * * * The small size and very high speed of these boats make them difficult targets to hit. * * * The success of an operation would not be made dependent upon a single shot or single boat, but attacks would be made by from two to six boats approaching in opposite directions. Even in a bright moonlight and with the greatest possible care and alertness it becomes impossible for a ship to anchor for a single night on a coast defended by these torpedo boats.
> Numerous and well-provided boats make a blockade an undertaking of the most difficult character. It makes it necessary for the blockading squadron to haul off the coast every night. Its coal supply is thereby wasted, the harbor is left open at night, the actuality of the blockade is threatened Even though under way, the squadron is not safe, for the boats can follow it out and find the ships.
> It is readily conceivable that in an energetic defense of this kind many boats will be disabled, through accident and the enemy's fire, and the number of boats must not be limited to that barely necessary for active work.

The German report then recommends that the German torpedo fleet be brought up to 150 boats, and gives the number possessed or building by other nations, as follows (1884): England, 129; France, 76; Russia, 125; Italy, 53; Holland, 24; Norway and Sweden, 15; Austria, 14; Denmark, 9; New Zealand, Austria, Brazil, Spain, Chili, Greece, and the Argentine Republic also possess one or more each of these modern craft. The report gives the average cost of a torpedo boat with its torpedoes and revolving cannon as $57,170.

Lieutenant Very concludes his paper by recommending as our minimum war footing a fleet of ninety boats and a minimum peace establishment of thirty-four, and says:

> But our builders having no experience in this work could not meet the demand. * * * A sufficient number should, however, be obtained from European manufacturers to serve as a model and to produce a sufficiently large flotilla to secure the training of officers and men.

A recent British writer remarked that even in England there were but few firms which made a success of building torpedo boats.

The German rule of one boat to every 10 miles of seacoast would require three hundred torpedo boats for the Atlantic coast alone. (Our Seacoast Defenses, by Lieutenant Griffin, United States Engineers.)

At present the United States possess nothing of the kind. We have one builder who could certainly fulfill the conditions of speed; but his boilers of a special type, valuable in many respects, have the disadvantage of requiring most skillful handling by carefully trained men, or they are likely to fail in steam-power at a critical moment, especially when the approach of the boat must be made by stealth and with more or less frequent stoppages. So that improvising tactics will not avail us in this direction. Wherever the torpedo boats come from we must secure them in time to learn how they should be properly handled, and such experience is gained, as is usual with experience of any value, only by careful and constant practice. Of all this our Navy knows nothing, except what it may chance to pick up by studying the current prints or by watching the daily routine of torpedo drill as carried on in in every foreign naval port.

In this résumé of existing foreign torpedo outfit and of our deficiencies a detailed notice of submarine gun discharge has been purposely omitted. The idea of projecting an explosive shell under water by gun power dates back to Fulton; nor has it been greatly improved upon since its earliest inception. A few years ago the scheme was revived by a distinguished American inventor, but the only official trial which ever took place was far from satisfactory. The first shot aimed at a target 285 feet distant failed to hit the mark; the second stuck in the mud, and the experiments have not since been resumed. The boat built to carry the submarine gun was altogether too frail and crank for service use in even moderate weather, and its acquisition by the Government, which has been suggested, would be a costly purchase at any price beyond current rates for old iron and firewood.

Among the objections to submarine gun fire we note the immense power required to obtain any sort of range for the inert shell through the high resistance of the water, the torpedo being a mere projectile without propelling power of its own. The power required for expelling this projectile requires in turn a strong and correspondingly heavy gun to withstand the bursting effect of its charge, and the weight of the gun leads us to injudicious increase in the size of the torpedo-boat and of the mark afforded to an enemy's fire. Moreover, the noise made by one discharge of the gun will effectually prevent a second shot under like conditions if the boat has stolen within range unobserved.

But even if we assume that with future successes the submarine gun will throw a kindly veil of oblivion over the fiasco of the past, the question is whether we must await such a problematical development or provide ourselves with existing and perfected weapons. Putting the claim upon a ground that can not be gainsaid, the Navy may fairly demand to be supplied with the Whitehead and the torpedo-boat, if only to learn the capabilities of weapons which are certain to be used against us by any hostile naval force. If we are not to be armed ourselves, we are at least entitled to know precisely what the weapons of our antagonists can do, that we may attempt to devise efficient defense.

In accepting the example of other nations as our guide for the immediate future we do not wish to exclude from consideration any meritorious new inventions or improvements which may be presented from time to time by Americans or foreigners. But let these novelties, while in the nursery stage, be classed where they belong, and appropriated for accordingly, not as weapons for the Navy but as experiments. Too much attention can not be given them as such, but we can not afford to saddle upon the ordnance estimates any such charges in the future as have been paid in the past, for erratic water-rockets and tubular cable monstrosities, while the general public is led to imagine that these crudities are adopted as actual implements of war. Service estimates should be for service weapons. The Navy has had more than enough of worthless crudities foisted upon it already.

The remedy for an existing lack of torpedo outfit is not far to seek. Place at the control of some naval officer of acknowledged ability, preferably the energetic chief of Bureau of Ordnance, the sum of, say, $2,000,000. Let the control of this official be absolute when his plan has been approved by the Secretary of the Navy and his proposed adjuncts. Give to the officer selected the widest scope as to his personal choice of subordinate officers to superintend the construction and acquisition of our modern weapons and let the whole responsibility be his.

In a word, and for once, put a naval matter in the hands of naval officers, interested in its success. The experiment will not be too costly. The sum named is but a little over double what has been paid for the latest wooden addition to our melancholy fleet, a vessel whose manifest inadequacy has already been fully discussed. The result of this trial may be confidently predicted. In three years, if need be, the United States will possess a fleet of at least thirty boats, armed with the best type of Whitehead, and possessing as high a speed as any such vessels afloat. We should find ourselves at last even with other nations, instead of trailing hopelessly behind. Starting from this point it will be unusual indeed if the Navy and our inventors can not keep abreast of improvement in the principles which render the offensive torpedo of to-day a weapon too formidable to be despised and too important to be neglected.

CONCLUSIONS.

The Navy now afloat consists of thirty-one cruisers, of which fourteen at the outside may be regarded as vessels worth possessing.

We have as coast defenders fourteen single-turret and five double-turret monitors, the former ridiculously inefficient in guns, armor, and speed; the latter in various stages of reconstruction, but which will be useful if completed according to existing designs.

We have three cruisers and one dispatch-boat building and four more cruisers on paper, these seven cruisers all to be modern vessels of good speed, coal endurance, and armament.

In ordnance we have enough modern guns building to arm the first three cruisers and dispatch-boat, some twenty-one guns all told. But we have no suitable gun-factory plant, nor is any American manufacturer prepared to furnish material except for the smaller guns. Our torpedo outfit is restricted to the spar topedo. Of high-explosive spar torpedoes we have not enough afloat to fit out even the small squadrons now in commission, nor do we possess a single torpedo boat or movable torpedo.

To establish a suitable gun factory and enable our manufacturers to supply gun material, to build and equip a fleet of at least fifty-six modern cruisers, to provide a squadron of thirty torpedo boats, to provide for the purchase of movable torpedoes, and to prepare and arm a modern line of battle of armored coast defenders and rams will cost, all told, between eighty and one hundred millions of dollars, or, say, ten millions a year for eight or ten years.

The sum of one hundred millions is about 2½ per cent. of the value of destructible property exposed to any enemy in eight of our Atlantic harbors enumerated by Lieutentant Griffin, United States Army, in Our Seacoast Defenses. The sum is also less than the average amount on hand daily at the mint and subtreasury alone in the city of San Francisco on the Pacific seaboard. These facts have their significance when we remember that the modern system is to make war sudden, sharp, and decisive, and to make the beaten party pay expenses. Germany exacted a billion of dollars from France in 1871, and under similar circumstances we should probably have to pay even more.

Let us suppose that Congress settles upon a definite plan for the reconstruction of the Navy, and that it has considered the proposals of modifying existing forms of naval administration; there will yet remain an issue upon which all hope of adequate vessels may be wrecked—the rock of political distrust, which prevents one party from countenancing the appropriation of large annual sums to be expended under the direction of a naval Secretary of opposite political views. But even this obstacle can be avoided by means which have been successfully used heretofore. Congress could perfectly well appoint as its commissioners of the naval-constructor fund a limited number of citizens with a national reputation for integrity and business sagacity, and whose political affiliations are not so strong as to render them objects of suspicion by either party.

Such a commission, if intrusted by Congress with the sole duty of seeing that certain funds are legitimately applied, may be safely trusted to perform its work to the satisfaction of the great body of voters. The knowledge of the commission as to naval affairs might be of the most limited kind, but (unless we greatly overrate the intelligence of our American commercial men) we believe that its representatives could see that American ships of war are built to mean business, and that the nation's funds are expended in a business-like way.

When the whole question of naval reconstruction is removed from politics and placed upon its proper footing, as a matter of national concern and of national honor, there are few partisans who could not sink their differences to effect results that they must desire as American citizens.

The flag of our country is displayed in the seas to-day far to leeward of other naval ensigns. It floats there to show that the policy of inaction and lack of definite purpose never pays, and that in naval matters, at all events, we can not drift to windward.

The task to be undertaken is a great one; its fulfillment will consume the greater part of a decade. But if Americans decide to make up for lost time, the old "long pull, strong pull, and the pull altogether" will safely place us where we belong.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] congratulates the country upon the very successful and satisfactory manner in which our naval affairs have been administered during the time the Republican party had control of the executive branch of the Government. He dwells with much apparent pride and satisfaction upon the bureau system of the Department, and challenges criticism as to the wisdom of the organization and as to the results it has accomplished.

Upon these propositions, Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate to join issue with the distinguished gentleman, and I do deny that the Navy Department was wisely and efficiently conducted during the period stated, and that its subdivisions are such as to merit the approbation of those whose experience and abilities entitle them to speak with authority upon the subject.

The soundness of a theory or the wisdom of a policy is demonstrated only by its practical application.

Many a magnificent scheme has been exploded when subjected to the crucial test of actual trial, and the folly of the plan becomes so apparent as to be easily appreciated by the dullest intellect.

If the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Maine and, to a certain extent, reiterated by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] be true, then our fleet should be in an admirable condition, worthy our greatness as a people and responsive to the immense sums of money that have, with lavish prodigality, been expended upon it for so many years past; and our navy-yards should be fully equal in their ability for rapid, economical, efficient, and skilled work to those of any European nation whatsoever.

But how is it with our war ships and naval workshops? Are the pictures so pleasingly drawn by these gentlemen—one speaking as to the bureau system and the other as to the general departmental management—true to reality?

The testimony which I have to offer is reliable. It comes not from the mouths of Democratic partisans. It is authoritative. Its entire correctness can not be successfully controverted. It will be accepted without hesitation by the committee and by the country as worthy every confidence. Secretary Hunt, in his report of November 28, 1881, alluding to the condition of the Navy, speaks of it in this wise:

> The condition of the Navy imperatively demands the prompt and earnest attention of Congress. Unless some action be had in its behalf it must soon dwindle into insignificance. From such a state it would be difficult to revive it into efficiency without dangerous delay and enormous expense. Emergencies may at any moment arise which would render its aid indispensable to the protection of the lives and property of our citizens abroad and at home, and even to our existence as a nation.
> We have been unable to make such an appropriate display of our naval power abroad as will cause us to be respected. The exhibition of our weakness in this important arm of defense is calculated to detract from our occupying in the eyes of foreign nations that rank to which we know ourselves to be justly entitled. It is a source of mortification to our officers and fellow-countrymen generally, that our vessels of war should stand in such mean contrast alongside of those of other and inferior powers.

Mr. Secretary Chandler, after enumerating the available cruising war vessels of the Navy, says in his annual report of 1882 that—

> These vessels are creditable in their appearance, commodius in their quarters for officers and seamen, well adapted for ordinary naval exercises, and useful for displaying the national flag upon the seas and in the harbors of the commercial world. But they are of low speed; their engines are not modern, only fourteen being compound; and their steaming, maneuvering, and destructive powers are inferior to those of the present war ships of other navies. It is not the policy of the United States Government to maintain a large navy, but its reputation, honor, and prosperity require that such naval vessels as it possesses should be the best which human ingenuity can devise and modern artificers can construct. Our present vessels are not such, and can not be made such.

Our present Secretary, Mr. Whitney, in his admirable and instructive report of November 30, 1885, submits to the President a graphic but painful and humiliating description of our fleet. He deals with the subject plainly and unflinchingly. On pages 32 and 33 of his report will be found the following:

> At the present moment it must be conceded that we have nothing which deserves to be called a navy. The highest official authority in our service said in 1876:
> "There is no navy in the world that is not in advance of us with regard to ships and guns, and I, in common with the older officers of the service, feel an anxiety on the subject which can only be appreciated by those who have to command fleets and take them into battle."

And so recently as 1883 the same distinguished authority stated that it was universally admitted that "we have no navy, either for offense or defense."

The country has expended since July 1, 1868—more than three years subsequent to the close of the late civil war—over seventy-five millions of money on the construction, repair, equipment, and ordnance of vessels, which sum, with a very slight exception, has been substantially thrown away, the exception being a few ships now in process of construction. I do not overlook the sloops constructed in 1874 and costing three or four millions of dollars, and to avoid discussion they may be excepted also. The fact still remains that for about seventy of the seventy-five millions of dollars which have been expended by the Department for the creation of a navy we have practically nothing to show.

It is questionable whether we have a single naval vessel finished and afloat at the present time that could be trusted to encounter the ships of any important power—a single vessel that has either the necessary armor for protection, speed for escape, or weapons for defense. This is no secret; the fact has been repeatedly commented upon in Congress by the leading members of both parties, confessed by our highest naval authorities, and deprecated by all.

And Admiral Porter, whose thorough and accurate acquaintance with everything connected with or pertaining to the duties of his high office and whose character, personal and professional, is beyond all question, thus feelingly writes of the fleet in his report of November 30, 1885. Says he:

At the present time we have literally nothing in commission but so-called "vessels of war" that can scarcely perform the duties of a peace establishment, and in case of a conflict with any naval power the aforesaid war vessels would have to go into retirement until peace was declared, the largest of them having neither speed nor battery that would enable her to contend successfully against a two-gun modern French or English gunboat.

But, Mr. Chairman, it may be supposed that the proof, though altogether reliable and coming from sources that make it convincing, is too general. To meet such objection I now present to the committee for its consideration the following tabular statement furnished me by the Navy Department.

Name of vessel.	Of what built.	When built.	Complement of officers and crew.	Original cost in Construction department.	Cost of repairs Construction department.	Original cost of machinery.	Cost of present machinery.	Cost of repairs to machinery.	Cost of equipment outfit.	Cost of repairs to equipment outfit.	Total cost including repairs.	Probable future length of effective service.

a This vessel was built of iron with single bottom and has 5 inches of laminated armor, turret from 10 to 11 inches in thickness, armed with muzzle-loading guns of antiquated type. It can not be said to be possessed of any value viewed from a military standpoint at the present time, and would require extensive repairs to make it fit for service.

In it not only appears the name, age, and character of every vessel, but there is also shown the original cost of each ship and all subsequent expenditures upon it in the way of repairs. The probable length of future effective service which may be expected of each vessel is also given.

This statement, carefully prepared—every figure taken from the original entry—furnishes the most conclusive testimony, not only as to the present condition of the fleet, but it also exhibits, with perfect accuracy and in the strongest light, the wasteful expenditure of the public treasure that has characterized our naval administration during the past twenty years.

It presents a sad commentary upon the wisdom, the economy, and the efficiency of those who have been charged with high and important functions, and is indeed a sorrowful answer to the vast sums that have been so liberally appropriated for the proper maintenance of this popular branch of the military service. Its entire accuracy can not and will not be questioned. The responsibility for this shameful condition of our Navy rests upon those who have been charged with the disbursement of the money intrusted them, and they will not be permitted to equivocate or to deny. The original entries are in the books of their own making and keeping. These books have been opened and examined, and upon their every page are found the indisputable evidences of their own official misconduct and everlasting disgrace.

So much as to our fleet. When viewed in the light of the facts which I have been able to lay before the committee "the some slight mistakes made even under the beneficence of Republican rule" admitted to have occurred by the distinguished gentlemen from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] develop into crimes of the greatest magnitude and call for the severest condemnation by all just-minded men of whatever political faith.

But how does it stand with reference to our navy-yards? Is their present condition such as to justify the expenditure that has been so lavishingly made upon them for the past twenty years?

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] commends most highly the present bureau system, and, in glowing and emphatic terms, pronounces it the perfection of wisdom and the careful embodiment of long official experience.

I have great confidence in the judgment of my friend from West Virginia, and, apart from political partisanship, would accept any opinion coming from him without question.

But to-day he seems to have lost that equipoise of judgment by which he is characterized, and, altogether ignoring what has heretofore been written upon the subject by an eminent and highly-trusted member of his own party, showers down upon the bureau system as at present constituted, in language strong, forcible, and copious, his choicest and richest benedictions.

I, however, appeal from the judgment of the honorable gentleman from West Virginia to the deliberately formed and carefully expressed opinion of Hon. William E. Chandler, ex-Secretary of the Navy, delivered under the sanction of a grave constitutional duty.

In his annual report of 1883, Mr. Chandler, referring to the defects in the navy-yard management, says:

> Much difficulty has been experienced in effecting navy-yard reforms, owing to the opposition of persons interested in the existing system, not only to closing the repair-shops in yards to be hereafter kept only as naval stations and arsenals, but also to concentration and economy at yards which are to be kept open for work. The assistance and specific directions of Congress should therefore be sought and effectively accorded. The arguments and facts which show that reforms should be instituted are overwhelming. The change of naval construction from wooden to steel ships would of itself involve a revolution in methods of work. With but little more than thirty vessels in commission, only five or six have required repairs at any one time, and by distributing these among as many navy-yards the cumbrous organization and heavy expenditures at each yard have been hung upon and charged to the one ship then in hand, with the results which published records have shown.

And again, in his report of 1884, he tells us, as the result of his official experience and of his thorough acquaintance with the present method of departmental work, that—

> There is something radically wrong in a system which unites in a single organism a military post with its routine, its forms and ceremonies, its modes of official correspondence, its quarters for officers, and its drill-grounds and barracks on the one hand, and a mechanical workshop devoted to operations that have not the remotest connection with the discipline of a military service. The organization, the methods of control required, the objects to be accomplished are totally dissimilar and incompatible. It would be wrong to undervalue the importance of military forms and usages and the elaborate but perhaps necessary machinery which is a characteristic feature of military administration; but it is clear that this is not the kind of machinery that belongs to a workshop.
> At the present time navy-yard administration is overloaded with traditions and customs, the work is obstructed by a cumbrous organization, technical responsibility is lost in the elaborately graded multitude of semi-technical and semi-military officials; instead of smoothness is to be found friction, instead of promptness delay and procrastination, instead of thrift extravagance, instead of unity of action a mass of discordant interests. And as if one such establishment were not enough of a blunder, the national policy, under the clamor of localities seeking patronage, has multiplied these military shops and dotted them all over the country, in order that the benefits of wasteful governmental expenditure may be shared by many States.

Here, Mr. Chairman, we find the Secretary of the Navy sustained by the President, and with a majority of the Senators in close political sympathy with him, proclaiming the grossly defective character of the departmental organization—complaining of the improper combination of powerful and interested influences to thwart every attempt toward the correction of existing evils—and calling upon Congress, with the greatest emphasis, to interpose and to assist him, by statutory enactment, in the laudable endeavor to correct the fearful abuses that were preventing an economical and efficient administration of our naval affairs.

That the committee, Mr. Chairman, may be advised as to the expenditures at the several navy-yards during the last seventeen fiscal years, under the mischievous operation of the prevailing bureau system, I submit the following tabular statement. [For statement see opposite page.]

This statement speaks for itself, and should immediately awaken every one, who may give it the proper consideration, to the necessity of the speedy inauguration of measures that will prevent such gross mismanagement in the future.

Mr. Chairman, while upon this subject I beg to call attention to several portions of the very able and exhaustive report of the present Secretary. Speaking of the organization of the Department, he says:

> It must be evident that there is something radically wrong with the Department. The universal dissatisfaction is the conclusive proof of this. It is expressed to me by influential members of both political parties, and quite universally by the naval officers, coupled with the hope and expectation that some remedy may be found and speedily applied. Placed temporarily in charge of the interests of the service, it forces itself daily upon me for consideration.

And again:

For the security of the public it is provided by law that the purchases of the Navy Department shall be by contract, after advertisement, and shall go to the lowest bidder; that only "regular dealers" shall be dealt with by the Department, which has been interpreted to mean persons whose occupation it is to deal in such articles with the general public. The contract system can be dispensed with only when there is an emergency certified to by the bureau officer for the immediate purchase, doubtless largely intended for a time of war. Without an efficient head to establish a system and attend to its proper enforcement in the matter of purchases, one would expect to find that order of things which has heretofore brought grave scandals upon the Department, namely, large private purchases where contracts were intended by law, and the business falling into the hands of naval contract brokers to the exclusion of regular dealers in the articles. These abuses (quite inevitable in the absence of a proper system) were investigated and exposed by Congressional committee years ago; but by recent investigations I find the same order of things largely existing down to a recent date, and the same men named in the Congressional report holding substantially the same relation to the Department as before, and with the same scandalous results.

The open purchases of the Navy Department for the year ending June 30, 1885, amounted to $841,285.84 while the purchases by contract amounted to only a little over a million. A large proportion of the open purchases consisted of articles of either comparatively small value, or more or less difficult of classification; but $138,000 of the amount was spent by the seven bureaus, each acting independently of the other for coal bought, not in one lot, but at 166 several open purchases (this does not include coal bought by ships on foreign stations); 299 different open purchases of stationery were made by eight different bureaus; $121,315 66 was spent for lumber and hardware by six bureaus in 499 separate open purchases. Seven bureaus spent $46,000 for oils and paints in 269 separate purchases; 117 different open purchases of iron and steel were made at an expense of $41,524.48; $68,881.59 was spent for hemp and cordage in 45 different open purchases. Eight bureaus supply stationery to ships; three bureaus supply ships with lamps and lanterns. To the same ship one bureau supplies electric lights and the light for general illuminating purposes; another supplies electric search lights, and a third oil and light for the engine and fire rooms.

These facts are taken from the records of the year ending June 30, 1885, and its showing is more favorable than that for the previous year.

And, also:

In the summer of 1883 an order was given for $61,000 worth of canvas to a person who was not a dealer in the article and at a time when there was the usual supply of canvas on hand.

Under an order made by Secretary Thompson in 1877 it was understood that the limit of any single purchase under a "certificate of necessity" was $500. For purchases involving a larger amount resort must be had to the ordinary contract system. Several months were consumed in the delivery of this $61,000 worth of canvas and the bills were made out in sums of less than $500 each. The "certificate of necessity" accompanied each one, and in that form the bills passed the Treasury Department.

Two or three of these bills, with the bureau officer's certificate of necessity upon them, would sometimes be dated and presented on the same day.

During the same year coal was purchased by different paymasters from the same person on or about the same days, deliverable at the very same place, of like quality and character, but at prices differing from 50 to 65 cents a ton.

It is idle to suppose that abuses of the character I have glanced at can be prevented merely by a change in the personnel of the Department. It is the system that is vicious.

And further:

Take the Omaha for an example. She has been rebuilt within the last four years, at an expense of $572,000. It was an act of the greatest folly. She in a repaired wooden vessel, with boilers, machinery, and guns, all of which would at the time have been sold for what they would have brought by any other nation on earth. In the event of a war she can neither fight nor run away from any cruiser built contemporaneously by any other nation. Her rebuilding cost the full price of a modern steel ship of her size and all modern characteristics.

At present the four heads of these bureaus, instead of co-operating, work independently of each other and not always in harmony in producing their respective parts of a completed ship. After the Omaha had been commissioned and was ready for sea, it appeared that the several bureaus working independently upon her had between them so completely appropriated her space that they had left her coal-room for not more than four days' steaming at her full capacity. Each bureau, too, finds it necessary to maintain its separate shops in the several navy-yards, each with a separate organization of foremen, quartermen, leading men, &c., so that shops doing precisely the same class of work—carpenter-shops and machine-shops, for instance, are commonly duplicated and sometimes triplicated in the same navy-yard with a corresponding multiplicity of foremen and organization expenses—a state of things which, under the present organization of the Department, it is almost impossible to correct.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, it will not be deemed necessary for me to further answer that portion of the speech of the gentleman from West Virginia which has reference to the bureau system as now maintained in the Navy Department. If these subdivisions of labor and authority were ever of any advantage to the country, those who favor their continuance should be required to demonstrate, with proof the most convincing, their entire adaptation to the purposes for which they were instituted.

But I will not dwell longer upon this subject. There is upon the Calendar of the House a bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, which, if enacted into law, will, it is confidently believed, bring about a considerable reformation of the abuses that have impaired the efficiency of the Naval Department for so many years, subjecting it to the imputation of the most shameful and wasteful extravagance, and of the corrupest practices that ever disgraced the government of a free people.

In reference to this bill, I desire to correct a statement just made by the gentleman from West Virginia. In his remarks I understood him to say that another bill upon the same subject was prepared by Mr. Whitney and submitted to the committee, and that he afterward acknowledged before the committee the impropriety of the bill, and desired that it should not be reported upon; and that the present bill, now upon the Calendar, was prepared by or at the instance of Mr. Whitney and submitted to the committee. If I have understood the gentleman correctly, I am bound to say that the gentleman from West Virginia is quite mistaken.

It was my habit to attend the meetings of that committee regularly, and I was present when the Secretary appeared before it. I heard no such acknowledgment from him. On the contrary, he strongly and earnestly favored its approval by the committee. That bill was discussed day after day by the committee, and it was only when the Republican members refused to join in the measure of reform that the chairman of the committee [Mr. HERBERT] himself prepared the bill now upon the Calendar and submitted it to the Secretary.

I repeat it, the bill, as presented to the committee, was not the work of the Secretary, but of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama. The Secretary of the Navy had nothing whatever to do with its preparation, and the gentleman from Alabama, on his own motion, submitted it to the Secretary of the Navy and then brought it before the committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to ask the gentleman if it was not introduced with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. SAYERS. It was introduced with the approval of the Secretary, for the reason that any reform inaugurated by this House would be better than none. It was approved by the Secretary because, under the present system, it would be impossible for him or any other Secretary to correct those vicious abuses which have been portrayed in such vivid colors by his predecessor, Mr. Chandler.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Would it be convenient for my colleague to inform me how he knows what the motives of the Secretary were in giving that approval?

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman from Maine had attended the meetings of the committee, as it was his duty to do, he might be as well informed upon that point as myself.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand my colleague to say that the Secretary of the Navy has, in any way, advised the Naval Committee of the reasons which induced him to approve the substitution of the second bill for the first one?

Mr. SAYERS. It was not necessary for him to advise the committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Very well. How, then, could I have been informed upon the subject by attendance at the meetings of the committee?

Mr. SAYERS. Because it was talked over repeatedly, openly and aboveboard, by the committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But how could the committee have been informed of the Secretary's motives?

Mr. SAYERS. Because the Secretary told the chairman of the committee, and by the chairman the committee was so informed. Now you have it; are you satisfied?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Ah! Some private understanding between the Secretary of the Navy and the chairman of the committee!

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; no such thing.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I am talking about official communications from the Secretary of the Navy to the Committee on Naval Affairs, not about private understandings.

Mr. SAYERS. I object to the gentleman further interrupting me. There were no private understandings. It is not the policy of our party.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then I would like the gentleman to state the official communication conveying this information.

Mr. SAYERS. I have not the time to further bandy remarks with the gentleman from Maine. It was my intention when this debate began to adopt a different line of argument before the committee, but the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] has seen proper to bring up the question of the Dolphin and the cruisers, which were undertaken to be constructed by Mr. John Roach, whom the gentleman has repeatedly, and with much apparent affection, termed "Honest John Roach."

Let me to say to the gentleman from West Virginia, and to all who think like him, Mr. Chairman, that we do not shrink from a most thorough and critical examination into everything connected with the dispatch boat—the Dolphin. We are more than willing that the light of intensest inquiry and criticism be turned upon that piece of business, and if anything can be discovered that will be agreeable to Honest John Roach, or to the advisory board, or, to the then Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, or to the then Secretary of the Navy, or to their friends, we will most heartily wish them every enjoyment of what small crumbs of comfort they may be able to seize upon.

By way of answer to what has been said by the gentleman from West Virginia upon this subject, I shall submit to the committee three propositions, and will endeavor to support each of them by such argument and evidence as will convince every unprejudiced mind of their entire correctness.

These propositions are:

First. That Mr. Roach undertook the construction of the Dolphin, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Chicago for a price much less than their proper construction would be reasonably worth, and that in order to partly save himself in the transaction he was compelled to build and did build the Dolphin so defectively, as compared with the terms of his contract, that it could not successfully answer the purpose for which it was intended.

Second. That the naval advisory board, whose duty it was, as defined by the statute, "to advise and assist the Secretary of the Navy in his office or elsewhere, in all matters referred to it by him relative to the designs, models, plans, specifications, and contracts for said vessels in all their parts, and relative to the materials to be used therein and to the construction thereof, * * * and to examine all materials to be used in said vessels and inspect the work on the same as it progressd and have the general supervision thereof under the direction of the Secretary," was either grossly neglectful of its duties or was incapable of their proper performance, or was in close sympathy with Mr. Roach and to the detriment of the Government.

Third. That Mr. Secretary Whitney, in all that he has done in reference to the Dolphin and the other vessels, has acted as an honest, faithful, and efficient officer, looking to the interests of the Government only in every step he took.

These propositions are plain, can be easily understood, and they comprehend the whole matter. Let us examine them carefully, with that spirit of fairness and sense of justice which is alike due to all concerned. Congress, in pursuance of the recommendation made by the naval advisory board in its report of December 20, 1882, authorized the construction of three cruisers and one dispatch boat as recommended by said board in said report, and especially provided that no such vessel should be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract.

As this report, Mr. Chairman, must necessarily be the beginning point in this examination, I invite the attention of the committee to the following passage:

Also one dispatch vessel or "clipper," to have a sea speed of 15 knots, to be built of iron, and be armed with one 6-inch breech-loading rifle and four revolving guns.

ESTIMATES.

Load displacement	tons...	1,500
Cost:
To hull		$230,000
To machinery		175,000
To ordnance		30,000
To equipment		25,000
Total		460,000

On the 28th day of April, 1883, Mr. Secretary Chandler invited proposals for the building of these vessels until July 2, 1883. Mark the shortness of the time. Congress had provided that at least sixty days should be allowed for this purpose, and the Secretary avails himself of the shortest limit. In this publication for proposals we find the following clause:

The three cruisers must be completed within eighteen months and the dispatch boat within twelve months from the execution of the respective contracts. Payments to each contractor will be made in ten equal installments as the work progresses, upon bills duly certified, from which 10 per cent. will be reserved, to be paid on the full and final completion of the contract.

There were four proposals submitted by as many different parties for each vessel, and as the amount of the several bids will to a certain extent indicate the estimated value of the work and material involved, I submit them to the committee.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] was unfortunate in calling the attention of the committee to these bids. Viewed in the light of subsequent events they can not fail to suggest the thought that "Honest John," when so greatly underbidding his rivals upon every ship, knew what he was about; that his loss would be only apparent, and from the investment he would surely reap a rich reward. "Honest John" was dealing with his friends. It would not do to lose the bids, whatever the seeming sacrifice.

And so "Honest John" secures the bids and executes his bonds, that for the Dolphin bearing date July 23, 1883.

To demonstrate, Mr. Chairman, how thoroughly inefficient a bond, however well drawn and carefully prepared, may become for the purpose apparent on its face whenever the contracting parties are strictly in accord with one another, I shall read to the committee some of the clauses that are to be found in the Dolphin bond. They are worth listening to, however inoperative they may have afterward become through the dexterous management of these mutual friends, the Secretary of the Navy, the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, the advisory board, and "Honest John Roach." One might well imagine that trained and skillful gamblers were at work. The contract intended for the public was duly signed, sealed, delivered, and admitted to record with all the solemnity of official routine. The contract to be executed was yet to see the light of day—perhaps never. The clauses, Mr. Chairman, that I desire to submit to the committee are as follows:

Whereas the act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1884, approved March 3, 1883, made an appropriation for the construction of a steel cruiser of not less than 4,300 tons displacement, then specially authorized by law; two steel cruisers of not more than 3,000 nor less than 2,500 tons displacement each, and one dispatch boat; and authorized the Secretary of the Navy to construct said vessels;

And whereas, after due advertisement, the proposal of the said principal party of the first part for the construction of the hull and machinery of one of said vessels, to wit, a dispatch boat of about 1,500 tons displacement, has been duly accepted by the Secretary of the Navy;

And whereas the drawings and specifications required by the act of August 5, 1882, have been duly provided, adopted, and approved in accordance with the provisions of said act relating thereto:

Now, therefore, this contract witnesseth that, in consideration of the premises and for and in consideration of the payments hereinafter provided for, the parties of the first part, for themselves, their heirs and assigns, personal and legal representatives, do hereby covenant and agree to and with the United States as follows, that is to say:

First. The said parties of the first part will, at their own risk and expense, construct, in conformity with the afore said plans and specifications hereto annexed, and in accordance with the provisions of the acts of Congress approved August 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883, respectively, before mentioned and relating thereto, one dispatch boat of about 1,500 tons displacement, with fittings as specified, of the following principal dimensions:

Length between perpendiculars, 240 feet; extreme breadth, 32 feet; depth in hold, 18 feet 2 inches; and provided and fitted with machinery, engines, and boilers complete in all their parts, appurtenances, and spare parts, and in all respects as described in the specifications, and deliver the same at the port of New York, N. Y., or Norfolk, Va., to such persons as the Secretary of the Navy may direct to receive the same, at either of said ports.

Second. The construction of the hull and machinery, and the fittings of the vessel, shall conform in all respects to and with the plans and specifications hereto annexed, which plans and specifications shall be deemed and taken as forming part of this contract with the like operation and effect as if the same were incorporated therein. No omission in the plans or specifications, of any detail, object, or provision necessary to carry this contract into full and complete effect, in accordance with the object and intent of the acts of Congress above mentioned, shall operate to the disadvantage of the United States, but the same shall be satisfactorily supplied, performed, and observed by the parties of the first part, and all claims for extra compensation by reason of, or for or on account of such extra performance are hereby and in consideration of the premises expressly waived.

Fourteenth. It is mutually understood, covenanted, and agreed, by and between the respective parties, that it shall not, under any circumstances, be obligatory upon the party of the second part to accept the vessel or any part thereof to be constructed under this contract unless the same shall have been completed in strict conformity with this contract, under the supervision of the naval advisory board, and in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 5, 1882, as modified by the act of March 3, 1883, hereinbefore referred to, and this qualification shall be deemed and taken as applicable and applying to each and every clause, covenant, and condition, express or implied, in this contract contained.

Fifteenth. It is hereby mutually and expressly covenanted and agreed, and this contract is upon the express condition, that no Member of or Delegate to Congress, nor any officer of the United States, naval, military, or civil, is, or shall be, admitted to any share or part of this contract, or to any benefit to arise therefrom.

Sixteenth. The United States, in consideration of the premises, do hereby contract, promise, and engage to and with the parties of the first part, as follows:

1. The contract price to be paid for the vessel, machinery, and fittings, to be constructed and furnished in accordance with this contract, shall be $315,000 (three hundred and fifteen thousand dollars).

2. Payment shall be made by the United States in ten equal installments, as the work progresses, with a reservation of 10 per cent. from each installment.

3. No payment shall be made except upon bills, in triplicate, certified by the inspectors and naval advisory board in such manner as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Navy, whose final approval of all bills thus certified shall be necessary before payment thereof.

4. All warrants for payments under this contract shall be made payable to the contractors or their order.

5. The last payment shall not be made until this contract shall have been fully performed by or on the part of the parties of the first part, and the vessel, machinery, and fittings shall have been accepted by the party of the second part, as in the tenth clause of this contract hereinbefore recited.

6. When all the conditions, covenants, and provisions of this contract shall have been performed and fulfilled by and on the part of the contractors they shall be entitled, within ten days after the filing and acceptance of their claim, to receive the aggregate amount of the reservations from the respective payments made to them during the progress of the work, on the execution of a final release to the United States, in such form as shall be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, of all claims of any kind or description under or by virtue of this contract.

The act in pursuance of which these vessels were to be built provides that neither of them shall be contracted for or commenced until full and complete detail drawings and specifications thereof, in all its parts, including the hull, engines, and boilers shall have been provided or adopted by the Navy Department, and shall have been approved, in writing, by said board or by a majority of the members thereof, and by the Secretary of the Navy. It is to be presumed that this provision of the law had been complied with before these contracts were made.

But, nevertheless, we find that while the Dolphin was undergoing construction no less than forty different changes in the plans of the hull, no less than fifteen different changes in the specifications for building the ship, and no less than thirty-eight different changes in the machinery, aggregating ninety-three changes in all, were actually made. At whose expense, Mr. Chairman, were these alterations effected? Is it to be supposed that "Honest John" suffered in consequence of such action? What was the advisory board doing before the execution of the contract? Its members were selected for their supposed eminent fitness for such duties. Were they wanting in capacity, or did they lack the requisite amount of attention and industry necessary to the perfection of the plans and designs of the vessel prior to the making of the contract? We will soon see how much these changes cost the Government. It is a well-known fact, obtaining in all branches of business, that it is in the alterations of agreements that contractors generally make their largest profits, especially when there has been competition in building.

I now, Mr. Chairman, desire to call the attention of the committee to the sixteenth clause of the contract. By reference to it the committee will see that a reservation of 10 per cent. upon each installment was to be retained until every condition, covenant, and provision of the contract had been performed and fulfilled by the contractor, and we also see that no payment should have been made to the contractor, except on bills in triplicate, certified by the inspectors and the naval advisory board and approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

This clause appears in each of the contracts for the construction of these vessels; yet, nevertheless, we find from this statement furnished me from the Fourth Auditor's office that it was disregarded. The statement reads thus:

Now, Mr. Chairman, am I doing an injustice to any one in saying that "honest" John Roach was in the hands of his friends, and that he had nothing to fear however low his bid?

The advertisement for proposals to construct these vessels notified the public that a reservation of such portion of the contract price would be retained until the satisfactory completion of the vessels; it was nominated in the bonds; and yet we find "honest" John Roach with the written consent of the Secretary of the Navy and of the advisory board, and with the permission of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, openly and boldly taking from the vaults of the Treasury the security, which by the terms of his contract the Government was to retain until the vessels had been constructed and delivered as he had agreed to do.

The true contract is coming to the light and appears to be quite different from that given to the public. The honorable gentleman from West Virginia has indulged his imagination in no small degree when speaking of this advisory board. Could the contractor, under the terms of his bonds, have drawn the reservations except upon triplicate bills certified by the board? If not, why did they certify the bills? Is it possible that the board did not have intelligence enough to understand the nature of the contract and its own responsibilities under it?

It was clearly its duty to represent the Government, not to assist the contractor in getting hold of the money before it was due him. The board in this and in other matters, that I will presently bring to the attention of the committee, did, in my opinion, great violence to its relations to the Government, and if it had been properly dealt with would be resting to-day under an indictment for conniving at a fraud upon the Treasury.

On the 19th day of January, 1885, in a communication to the Attorney-General, Mr. Chandler, speaking of these vessels, says:

One of the ships has been wholly finished, two more are nine-tenths finished, and the fourth is almost eight-tenths finished, all in full conformity with the contract.

Note their condition and then refer to the report of the advisory board of March 17, 1885, upon the second preliminary trial of the Dolphin, in connection with the Fourth Auditor's account, and it will be perceived that Mr. Roach was permitted to draw—contrary to the express terms of the contract—$28,350 of the reservations on the Dolphin and $155,690 on the other ships, making in all $184,040 taken from the Treasury during the month of February, 1885, with the written consent of the contractor's friends, among whom might also be properly included the then Attorney-General, Mr. Brewster. And if, in addition to this large sum thus illegally withdrawn, we consider the allowances to Mr. Roach because of alterations, $46,833.38, which were also paid him, we will not be astonished at the immense advantages which one, who basks in the sunshine of official favor, has over ordinary mortals in the race of life.

Mr. MILLS. Do I understand my colleague to say that none of the vessels had been accepted when these reservations were drawn?

Mr. SAYERS. Not one of them had been then accepted by the Government. The statement of Mr. Chandler, which I have just read, shows their then condition as he thought it.

Mr. WISE. They never were completed by Mr. Roach.

Mr. SAYERS. The condition of the Fourth Auditor's Office in respect to these vessels became known to Mr. Whitney immediately after his accession to office, and evidently aroused in his mind the suspicion that something was wrong.

Mr. Chairman, what safeguards have the people for protection against public plunderers, if men high in official position, and enjoying the confidence of a great party, then in control of the executive branch of the Government, will not only permit contracts to be thus violated in the interest of their favorites but also actively assist in finding reasons and opportunities for breaking them, to the very great disadvantage of the Government?

We now come to the period in the history of these transactions, when the Dolphin is to be put upon her trial trips preliminary to her acceptance by the Government, and again we find "honest" John Roach and the advisory board in the closest and most friendly companionship. They travel along like brothers. One would not imagine that they occupied independent and antagonistic relations. When we last saw them they were at the Treasury; now they are on board of the Dolphin. It is her first trial trip. How does she behave herself? Is she such a vessel as this advisory board recommended to Congress in 1882? What are the tests that are put to her? The advisory board is still dealing gently with "honest" John. She is put upon the smooth and calm waters of Long Island Sound. An accident happens—a trifling one, however.

I will read, Mr. Chairman, to the committee a portion of the report of the advisory board:

NAVAL ADVISORY BOARD, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, 24th November, 1884.

SIR: The board would respectfully report that it was notified by the contractor, Mr. John Roach, that the Dolphin would be ready on the 20th instant for the preliminary trial to test the machinery, engine, boilers, and appurtenances, as required by the ninth clause of the contract. This trial was to be made, as recommended by the board in its letter to the Department of 11th September, in Long Island Sound, and the data to be recorded as required by the United States steam log, and as approved by the Department in a letter to the board of 25th October.

The contract conditions were as follows:

(2) That the collective indicated horse-power developed by said engines under the prescribed conditions shall be two thousand three hundred (2,300), and maintained successfully for six consecutive hours; provided that in case of the failure of the development of this power, the vessel shall be accepted if it can be shown to the satisfaction of the naval advisory board and the Secretary of the Navy that this failure was due neither to defective workmanship nor materials.

The board assembled on board the Dolphin at 8 a. m., on the 20th instant, at the dock in East River at the foot of Eighth street.

The ship left the dock at 9.15 a. m., and proceeded at two-thirds power into the Sound. At 10.46 a. m. she passed Execution Rock light at full speed; the agreement being to run as nearly as possible a straight course at full speed to the Middle Ground light, 30½ miles distant, and as far beyond as neccessary to occupy a time of three hours, in order that six hours might expire on the return to Execution Rock light.

At 12 h. 40m. 10s. the engines slowed down for twenty minutes to examine a bearing; with this exception the engines worked continuously, the boilers furnished ample steam, the fire-room blowers furnishing excellent draught until 2.36 p. m., when, the vessel having fallen off four points while turning at full speed to return, the thrust-length of the main shaft broke just at the neck of the coupling abaft the main bearing.

No damage, further than a slight injury to the bearings of the broken length of shaft, was done to the machinery, and the vessel then came to anchor, lying 4 miles southeast of Falkner's Island light, and assistance was sent for.

The board is gratified to state that, except for this accident, the vessel would have been recommended for acceptance, as the average collective indicated horse-power of the engines was 1,954, and the maximum, 2,151; the average over the ground for the whole distance of 55.7 nautical miles run was, approximately, 15.3 knots per hour.

The board estimates that the speed through the water for one hour, for which more accurate observations were obtained, was at the rate of 16 to 16¼ knots.

The trial was sufficient to convince the board that the vessel will fully meet the estimates of her design when a continuous trial is obtained after the shaft is replaced.

The contractor, it will be readily perceived, is not in the hands of an enemy. The report is short and to the point, but a careful analysis develops the fact that she is not the vessel which Congress desired to be constructed. She has not yet been tried upon a rough sea and before a heavy gale. Let us see how this vessel shows herself upon her second trip. I commend the report of the advisory board to the careful consideration of the committee. "Honest" John and his friend—the advisory board—are again upon deck. They again proceed to the smooth waters of Long Island Sound. The day is not unpleasant, nor is the cruise disagreeable. Everything is auspicious. Let me read portions of the board's description of their day's enjoyment:

NAVAL ADVISORY BOARD, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 17, 1885.

SIR: The board has the honor to report that the preliminary trial of the Dolphin has been made in accordance with the ninth clause of the contract for the construction of that vessel, concluded July 23, 1883.

As stated in our report of November 24, 1884, the Dolphin was presented for preliminary trial on November 20 last, and while on trial on that date the thrust-length of the steel shafting broke. A new thrust-shaft was made of forged steel, as recommended by the board and approved by the Department in letters dated November 28. This shaft, after being manufactured under the inspection of the board and tested in accordance with instructions approved by the Department on December 5, 1884, was rejected for the reasons stated in the board's letter to the Department of January 9, 1885. Then, in order to avoid delay, the board recommended that this shaft be made of wrought-iron, it being then the intention to retain the other steel shafts, the tests for their examination having so far developed no flaws.

Subsequently, however, in the examination of the broken shaft such extensive additional flaws were discovered in the center of its length, and as flaws were also found in drilling the end of the intermediate shaft, the board decided that the intermediate and steel propeller shafts should be removed and replaced by iron ones under the conditions approved by the Department for the steel shafting of the cruisers, in its letter to the board of January 15, 1885. This decision was approved by the Department and the Dolphin's shafting as tried on the 10th instant consisted of the original built-up crank-shaft, forged from steel blooms with cranks of wrought-iron and steel crank-pins and three lengths of forged scrap-iron shafts of 13¼ inches diameter. Certain changes in detail of the vessel have been made and completed as approved by the Department since the first trial, all of which have tended to the increase of the efficiency of the vessel and contributed to the success of the trial, of which the results were, in detail, as follows:

The Dolphin, in charge of the contractor, Mr. John Roach, left the dock at the foot of Eighth street, on the East River, New York city, at 8.50 a. m., Tuesday, March 10, to make the preliminary trial in Long Island Sound.

The weather was clear; the thermometer showed 31° Fahrenheit; a stiff breeze blew all day from the northwest, at the rate of about 30 miles an hour, according to the Signal Office records; the tide was high at Ward's Island at 5.22 a. m.

The Dolphin's draught of water is 11 feet 7 inches forward, 14 feet 7 inches aft, 13 feet 1 inch mean; the displacement was 1,300 tons, or 200 tons less than the load displacement.

The degree of completeness, apart from the requirements of the contract, will be shown sufficiently by the following statement: No armament, ammunition, provisions, or stores on board; whale-boat and large cutter at the davits; masts, spars, and rigging complete, no sails on board, water-tanks full, and about 120 tons of coal in the bunkers; anchors and chains on board.

The period of six consecutive hours, during which the engines were to be worked at full power, was begun when the buoy at Throg's Neck bore abeam at 9 hours 58 minutes 4 seconds a. m.

The machinery in all its parts worked smoothly, continuously, and satisfactorily throughout the trial, and the board is of the opinion that the deficiency of 182 horse-power from the mean of 2,300 required by the contract for six consecutive hours was not due to defective workmanship nor materials, but that with better coal and a well-trained engineers' force these results will be exceeded.

According to the records of the board, the total weight of the machinery, engines, boilers and appurtenances, and spare parts, completed as required, including water in surface condensers and boilers, does not exceed the limit of 430 tons set by the contract. The board finds that the hull and fittings are strong and well built, and in strict conformity with the contract, drawings, and specifications, and that the vessel will be completed in all respects, as required by the contract, on the 18th instant, except the following minor items, namely: adjusting the Hotchkiss-gun centers, and fitting the sideboards for dishes, which can only be completed after the vessel is at the navy-yard.

The board therefore recommends that the Dolphin be accepted, subject to the provisions of the ninth and tenth clauses of the contract, and orders issued to the contractor for her delivery to the commandant of the New York navy-yard, as already agreed upon, on the 18th instant.

The board will forward approved bills for the final payments, in accordance with the memorandum submitted to the Department, being in amount the tenth payment on the contract and the amounts due for changes and additions, as approved by the Department, less the reservation of $8,000, to be withheld under the tenth clause of the contract, and the amounts due the Government on approved changes in the original plans.

It will be noted, Mr. Chairman, in this report, that the steel shaft made to take the place of the one broken upon the first trial trip had been rejected, and that flaws had been detected in the intermediate and steel propeller-shafts, notwithstanding the very great satisfaction expressed by the board in its report of November 24. In consequence of the detection of these flaws and of the rejection of the new steel thrust-shaft and of the intermediate and steel propeller shafts, iron shafts were substituted in their stead. Why this change from steel to iron? What is the reason given by the board for its allowance? The contract required steel. The board says that the change from steel to iron was permitted in order to avoid delay.

There can be but one opinion touching the matter. There was no necessity for haste. Hostilities were not pending, nor did the slightest indication of a war exist. The board was ostensibly the representative of the Government, and it should not have shown itself so ready to accommodate the contractor. The anxiety so clearly manifested by the board to force this vessel upon the Government was, to use no harsher phrase, altogether unseemly. Its conduct can not but arouse the suspicion that there was an intense desire to have the matter settled before the new administration could sufficiently inform itself, so as to act with the proper regard for the public interest. Why, Mr. Chairman, if a gentleman should desire to purchase a horse for driving or for riding, unless he were very familiar with the animal, he would test his qualities oftener and at longer stretches before taking him than did this board the Dolphin, when they recommended her acceptance.

The reason given—to avoid delay—will satisfy no unbiased mind. It tends only to excite ridicule and disgust, or to provoke a just and righteous feeling of indignation against this open exhibition of a flagrant disregard for the public welfare.

A vessel—to which is to be intrusted the lives and honors of gallant men, and upon whose strength and speed may depend the fate of battles and the preservation of cities from assault and capture—should be subjected to severer tests than those applied by the advisory board to the Dolphin.

What was the plain and unmistakable duty of Mr. Secretary Whitney in the premises? He had become cognizant of the gross irregularities in the office of the Fourth Auditor, to which I have already alluded. The great number of changes that had been made in the designs and plans of the vessel had been brought to his attention. The results of the first and second trial trips on Long Island Sound were known to him.

He acted just as any honest man and faithful official would do, if like situated. The advisory board had clearly demonstrated its entire unfitness for the purposes for which it had been constituted. To rely upon it longer would be practically to rely upon the contractor; for the issue had been clearly made and the advisory board had committed itself so strongly to the fortunes of the vessel, that the reputations of both board and vessel were alike involved.

The present Secretary had but one course to adopt. He acted promptly and unhesitatingly, and in so doing showed himself worthy the position he occupies with reference to the President and to the country. He applied to the Attorney-General for an opinion as to the law of the case, and at the same time called to his assistance another board, composed of two naval officers and one civilian, all skilled in the science of naval architecture. Of this no one should be heard to complain.

The Attorney-General in his response said as to the defect in the article of speed:

The act of Congress under which the vessel was built (22 Stat., 477) makes an appropriation for the construction of "one dispatch boat, as recommended by the naval advisory board in its report of December 20, 1882." Upon reference to that report it will be found, as I am informed by you, that the board recommended the construction of "one dispatch vessel or clipper, to have a sea speed of 15 knots," and I take it as very clear that the recommendation became, by force of this reference to it, as much a part of the statute as though it had been recited therein word for word.

The contract contains no express covenant as to the speed of the vessel—unless one is necessarily involved in the stipulation for a "collective indicated horse-power" of two thousand three hundred—but its very first covenant is to construct a dispatch boat "in conformity with the aforesaid plans and specifications hereto annexed, and in accordance with the provisions of the acts of Congress approved August 5 and March 3, 1883, respectively, before mentioned and relating thereto," and I am of opinion that the covenant bound the contractor as effectively to make a ship "of the sea speed of 15 knots" as though he had agreed to do so in express words.

It may be said, possibly, that the covenant as to power and speed is not absolute, but qualified by the provision that, if upon the trial trip the engines should not develop the full power called for by the contract, and the failure should not be due to "defective workmanship or materials," the ship should be accepted by the Government nevertheless.

This attempt to bind the Government to take from the contractor's hands a ship of less power and speed than what the act of Congress peremptorily requires is, in my opinion, utterly null and without effect. It was to the quality of speed more than any other that Congress was looking, as the terms "dispatch vessel or clipper" used in the report of the advisory board referred to in the law plainly show. Congress deemed that the service required a swift vessel of a sea speed of 15 knots, and it directed such a vessel to be contracted for and built.

The contractor can not be heard to allege ignorance of the very law under which the contract was made. He was bound to know the source and extent of the authority of the official with whom he contracted. "Individuals as well as courts," say the Supreme Court, "must take notice of the extent of authority conferred by law upon a person acting in an official capacity, and the rule applies in such a case that ignorance of the law furnishes no excuse for any mistake or wrongful act." (Whiteside et al. vs. The United States, 93 U. S., 257; Hawkins vs. United States, 96 U. S., 691; The Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall., 666.)

With a full knowledge of the statute authorizing the construction of a dispatch boat of a designated speed and no other, and with the plans and specifications under which the work was to be done laid before him that he might bid with intelligence and safety, the contractor, if he had misgivings whether a vessel planned like the Dolphin would make the required speed, should have abstained from sending in proposals, knowing as he did, or ought to have done, that a ship defective in point of speed could not be accepted under the statute, whatever her merits might be in other respects.

Under any other view the most imperative requirements of Congress would be liable, at all times, to be evaded upon one pretext or another. I can not conceive how it could be seriously urged that the United States is bound under the law in question to accept from the contractor any other sort of vessel than the one ordered by Congress to be built—namely, a dispatch boat or clipper of a sea speed of 15 knots; and the Dolphin having been found not to be a vessel of that description, as I must assume, it would seem to follow that nothing short of an act of Congress could authorize her acceptance.

And as to the lack of the necessary strength the same authority says:

If this defect exists, as I must assume, it is fatal, whether due to the plans upon which the vessel was built or not, because, by the ninth clause of the contract, the contractor and his sureties stipulate "that the vessel constructed under this contract shall be sufficiently strong to carry the armament, equipment, coal, stores, and machinery prescribed by the naval advisory board and indicated in the annexed drawings and specifications."

* * * * * * *

Now, it is too plain for serious discussion that the contractor has by this covenant undertaken to make a ship for a specific purpose in accordance with given drawings and specifications, and has, to all intents and purposes, warranted that the ship so agreed to be built shall be "sufficiently strong" for that purpose. In a word, the contractor, by this covenant, makes the plans of the advisory board his own, and agrees to construct a vessel of sufficient strength according to those plans.

Manifestly, then, the Dolphin, which I am bound to assume, in view of the report accompanying your communication, is anything but "sufficiently strong," can not, for this reason alone, be accepted by you under the contract, the defect mentioned being fundamental in character.

The third objection, as to the general character of the workmanship of the vessel, I need not stop to consider, in view of your representation that, if the vessel is otherwise in accordance with the contract, this objection can be readily dealt with by you, the contractor being ready and willing to make the vessel satisfactory in this respect also.

As to whether the Government has been in any wise estopped or compromitted by acts of acquiescence, approval, or acceptance by the advisory board or others, I am of opinion that the Government stands unaffected by any such acts. This must be the case necessarily, if the law authorizing the building of a dispatch boat is to have effect. Its language is that "no such vessel shall be accepted unless completed in strict conformity with the contract, with the advice and assistance of the naval advisory board," * * * and consequently no acceptance of a vessel not built "in strict conformity with the contract" could bind the Government. Neither the Secretary of the Navy nor any officer under him had any dispensing power over this statute, the words of which, appearing as they do in a context displaying great solicitude for the protection of the public interests, can not be taken in any other sense than as mandatory without a plain disregard of the legislative intention.

The power to accept a ship built under this law can not be exercised unless the fact be that the ship was constructed in strict conformity with the contract, and the mere enunciation from any official quarter that the ship was so constructed, when in truth it was not, lends no validity whatever to a pretended act of acceptance. It was not the intention of Congress that the United States should be foreclosed or concluded in any such way, or that any departure from the contract, except as expressly provided for, should be condoned by the act or judgment of any official, and that it should be open at all times to show that a vessel alleged to have been built and accepted under the law was not so built and accepted. It was competent for Congress to create an extraordinary barrier of this kind against fraud and inefficiency, and it is the duty of those called upon to apply their language to do so in such a way as to make it effective.

The case of the Floyd acceptances, already referred to, shows how difficult it is to bind the Government, by the acts of its officers, in the matter of contracting for and disbursing its moneys; and before that case was decided an opinion by one of my predecessors was given sustaining the view that was afterward adopted in that case. (10 Opin., 288.)

After all, this is but an application of the general doctrine that the Government of the United States, in transactions of this character, is not ordinarily bound by an estoppel. (Fennemore vs. United States, 3 Dallas, 363; Johnson vs. United States, 5 Mason, C. C., 425; United States vs. Collier, 3 Blatch., C. C., 325; Cook vs. United States, 12 ib., 43, 61; Herman Estoppel, § 219; 10 Opin., 231; 12 ib., 43.)

These references show the application of this doctrine in almost every conceivable shape; and also, that in dealings with the Government, upon contracts, there is always a safeguard, until the final acceptance by the proper officer, and a disbursement of the money.

The opinion of the Attorney-General, Mr. Chairman, upon the points submitted him can not be otherwise than entirely satisfactory to every one whose prejudices are not so great as to utterly destroy his ability to reach a just conclusion upon the merits of this transaction. It comes from one who stands in the very front rank of his profession, and as such—independent of his high official position—his opinion carries with it a force that is absolutely irresistible.

The board selected by Mr. Secretary Whitney to examine the Dolphin at once entered upon the discharge of the duties incident to its appointment, and on the 15th of June, 1885, submitted a report, from which I read to the committee the following extracts:

The board, after some delay in collecting the data necessary for its information, convened at New York on the 16th April, 1885, and was occupied more or less in the duties before it from that date until the 11th instant; and after careful examination of the vessel and trials under steam, together with all the facts obtainable with regard to the progress of her construction and the changes made from time to time in the original contract and specifications by authority of the naval advisory board, find that, in its opinion, the vessel has not in all respects been constructed in accordance with the terms of the contract and specifications, in that, in various parts and particulars, "the materials and workmanship used and applied in the construction of the hull of said vessel, in details and finish," were not found to be "first-class and of the very best quality," as required and stipulated in said contract and its specifications.

The Dolphin is intended for a dispatch boat. She has, and was intended to have, very little offensive power. Reliable speed is therefore her first and greatest requisite for usefulness. She must be able to possess this quality in all weather and under all conditions at sea.

The law authorizing the construction of the Dolphin provided for a "sea speed" of 15 knots per hour. A dispatch boat not having the ability to make that speed continuously in such weather as she may reasonably be called upon to encounter, would at this day not answer the purposes of the service.

That a boat of her size should possess this requisite speed it is absolutely indispensable that she should have great strength and stiffness. That the Dolphin has not the requisite strength and stiffness to enable her to make the speed required under the conditions she must be prepared to meet, admits of no doubt, in the opinion of the board.

The board witnessed her performance on the smooth waters of Long Island Sound on three occasions. The conditions were most favorable, but the speed attained, making proper allowance for tidal influences, was not in excess of 15 knots per hour, a result very far from promising a like speed on the sea under the conditions she must always be ready to meet in actual service; for in order that a vessel should keep up a sea speed of 15 knots per hour she should be able to make from 17 to 17½ knots per hour in smooth inland waters like the sound.

On the occasions referred to the vibration of the Dolphin when subjected to only that duty and test was very perceptible, and of a character to demonstrate inadequate strength and stiffness. Under such circumstances the floors of the engine-room were observed to spring severely. And this, let be it noted, occurred when she was subjected to much less severe duty than she must be expected to encounter when actually engaged in the service for which she was intended.

These facts, so obvious to the board, needed no corroboration, but corroboration was furnished on the second of the unsuccessful trial trips witnessed by the board. On that occasion her after crank-pin became hot after a short run—even before the actual trial begun. This pin had given no trouble on the previous trial, and the board was informed by the contractor and his men that it had never before given any trouble. The only reason apparent for the trouble on this occasion, and the one to which it was doubtless due, is to be found in the following facts: On the previous unsuccessful trial about 40 tons of pig-iron had been put in the forward part of the ship to trim her. Five tons more were added on this occasion, and of course some portion of the coal had been consumed from her bunkers. Even these slight changes in the situation of weights were seemingly sufficient to alter her shape so as to cause this after crank-pin to heat almost at once.

The contract, among other things, provides that "provision be made for closing the fire-room hatches and other openings sufficiently tight to maintain an air pressure equivalent to a head of water of 1 inch in the fire-room," and that the ship's engines shall in a trial trip of six hours indicate 2,300 mean horse-power.

With regard to the first stipulation, no attention seems to have been given for its proper observance, the contractor alleging that such pressure had been obtained on the first trial, witnessed by the advisory board, by using tarpaulins to cover the hatches, but, owing to changes made by the board with regard to the blowers, he could not now get the pressure. It is only too evident that such an alleged contrivance was but a makeshift at best, and could be of no practical value.

With regard to the stipulation as to horse-power, two unsuccessful attempts to run the Dolphin in Long Island Sound for a period of six hours were witnessed by this board. On the third trial the Dolphin succeeded in running the required six hours, and she subsequently made a fourth trial at sea from Sandy Hook to Barnegat Light and loaded to her sea displacement. The trip at sea, however, gave no test of her sea-going qualities, as the water was as smooth as had been previously found in the sound.

On the first unsuccessful trip for the period she was running on the trial her engines indicated a mean collective horse-power of 2,088; on the second occasion her after crank-pin became heated, as previously stated, before the actual trial began; on the third occasion her engines indicated for the period of six hours a mean collective horse-power of 2,253; and on the fourth trial, the boilers making steam under natural draft alone, the horse-power developed by engines and pumps was 1,648.

On all these occasions great efforts were made by the contractor and his men to show the utmost power which could be developed. Her coal was of a superior quality, her engine and fire rooms in charge of regular engineers, and streams of water were kept playing on the journals to prevent heating; in short, her conditions in all respects were more favorable than those she can be expected to have when in service, especially when called upon to run day after day under the varying phases of wind, sea, and weather on the open ocean—the only test of real value in determining the qualities of a sea-going vessel.

With regard to the general workmanship found on board the Dolphin the board is of the opinion that it does not conform to the terms of the contract and specifications in many particulars, as will be seen by reference to the appendix marked 1, annexed to this report, giving in detail the proceedings and findings of the board.

Since the board began its detailed examination, the results of which are embodied in this report and its addenda, the contractor has been at work upon the vessel from time to time in remedying defects discovered by the board, and the Dolphin is now in much better condition and appearance than when the board first saw her, and in some important regards she is substantially improved.

For instance, she has been stiffened forward in the fore peak abreast the bawse pipes by a vertical plate brace, a point where special weakness was observed; in the after transom, where the reverse frames were cut off, the cut frames have been connected by a floor plate; the spar-deck and berth-deck have been calked fore and aft; the step of the mizzenmast, which was weak and insecure by reason of defective support, has been strengthened to a degree promising perfect security; the skin of the vessel has been repainted at various points where the skin was accessible; the hold store-rooms, fore and aft, have been freshly painted and fitted with proper shelving, and other things have been done in the direction of making the Dolphin a much better ship than the board found her on its first inspection.

In an appendix to this report there is a detailed statement specifying the defects apparent in the construction of the vessel.

In number these defects are fully one hundred, many of them being of a very substantial character.

There is, Mr. Chairman, a report from Captain Meade, of the Navy, made to the Secretary on the 20th of March, 1886. Captain Meade had been in charge of the vessel ever since the 3d of December, 1885, and was thoroughly acquainted with her qualities, good and bad.

From this report I desire to submit to the committee the following extracts:

The Dolphin, as at present fitted, can not safely be driven at full power even in moderately rough water, and my opinion is, she is merely useful for smooth-water dispatch.

Under these circumstances it seems rather a misnomer to call her a "dispatch vessel."

And comparing her with sea-going vessels she appears to great disadvantage, since she is too large, too expensive, and too ill-arranged and inconvenient for use as a pleasure craft. (See Inclosure C.)

About 2.30 p. m., with the acquiescence of the civilian experts, I altered the course to the westward to close with the land, and ran the vessel in the trough of the sea to test her rolling powers. I soon found I could not run her over forty revolutions per minute without endangering the boats, and forty revolutions under the circumstances only gave a speed of about 6 knots. The engine-room pendulum showed the greatest roll to be 26°, but the pendulum in the pilot-house marked 40° to leeward and 31° to windward. Yet the roll was easy, and she shipped no water so long as the revolutions were kept down to 40. The experiment of increasing them to 50 caused her to roll quickly and uneasily, and I slowed again.

To sum up, I consider the Dolphin reasonably strong, and her machinery reliable. As to the latter, there is too much of it; it occupies too much space, and seems to have been carefully designed to employ as many men as possible. The general plan of the ship and machinery is unsatisfactory. In my judgment a vessel like the Dolphin is wholly unsuited to the needs of our Navy. The internal arrangement has many absurd features to the eye of a practical seaman, but on the whole, except as to rough work, my criticism of this vessel concerns the designer rather than the builder. (See Inclosure F.) As the Dolphin in her present condition is merely a smooth-water nondescript, too large and too expensive for use as a yacht and of too limited capacity for a freight boat, being unable to berth comfortably even her own ship's company, I can not help regarding her as a species of marine "crazyquilt"—that is, she shows her design to be the outcome of many conflicting opinions and not that of one controlling and competent brain. Much of the work, especially the decks, joiner work, riveting, cementing, &c., is of a careless or cheap character, indicating either negligence or sharp practice at the yard where she was built, or gross carelessness in the inspection by the Government board and officers detailed for that duty. The inspection of the Dolphin's hull especially calls for severe censure. (See Inclosure D.)

This report was made after actual trial of the ship's speed and working qualities. The ability of this officer is unquestioned, and no charge has been brought against him because of any partiality or prejudice toward any of the persons connected with this unfortunate controversy.

Whatever speed the Dolphin may have developed upon the very limited trials given her by the advisory board and upon which their reports of November 24, 1884, and March 17, 1885, are founded—these trials having been made upon the smooth waters of Long Island Sound—it can not be successfully maintained that the speed reported by that board was equal to a sea speed of 15 knots.

It is my understanding, Mr. Chairman, that there is a difference between ordinary speed and sea speed, and that the rule is, if a vessel is to accomplish a sea speed of 15 knots, she must be able to make a speed in smooth waters of from 17½ to 18 knots.

Mr. GOFF. Will the gentleman permit me to inquire his authority for that statement?

Mr. SAYERS. I am more than willing to furnish the authorities if I can be allowed the time.

Mr. HERBERT. Will my colleague upon the committee [Mr. SAYERS] allow me to read two lines?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HERBERT. I read from the report of the examining board, page 302 of the last report of the Secretary of the Navy:

In order that a vessel should keep up a sea speed of 15 knots per hour, she should be able to make from 17 to 17½ knots per hour in smooth waters like the sound.

This is a distinction, which the gentleman from West Virginia in his speech entirely ignored.

Mr. GOFF. I concede that the report of the examining board makes the statement, but the advisory board took issue with that statement and denied its truth.

Mr. SAYERS. I decline to be further interrupted, unless more time is allowed me. Upon the question of the difference between ordinary speed and sea speed, Mr. Chairman, permit me to read to the committee an extract from the report of the first advisory board, made November 7, 1881. That board was composed of R. W. Shufeldt, rear-admiral, president of board; Henry Steers, naval architect; Miers Coryell, marine engineer; Alexander Henderson, chief engineer; J. A. Howell, commander; Edward W. Very, lieutenant; F. L. Fernald, naval constructor.

These gentlemen, all officers of the Navy and distinguished for their professional ability and experience, say:

The board decided that, in estimating the proper speed allowance for vessels, what is commonly known as maximum speed, or speed in smooth water on the measured mile, should not be considered, as such a basis is a deceptive one; but that the speed recommended should be the average speed at sea that the vessel would be capable of making under full power.

In order that a high rate of speed may be maintained at sea, a great weight of machinery is necessary, and also a great amount of space in the holds of the vessel. These demands alone place a limit upon the minimum displacement of the ship; while, on the other hand, the necessity of keeping within bounds in the draught of water of the ship, and of restricting the length and other measurements to limits that will permit a proper amount of handiness in maneuvering power, places a limit upon the maximum displacement, and consequently upon the speed.

It is the opinion of the board that the maximum sea speed that can be recommended as the measure of the size of the largest class of vessels is 15 knots per hour.

Upon the same subject Lieutenant Very, of the Navy, testified in this manner:

Take, for example, a ship and put her on the line between Liverpool and New York, and if, after running for a year (taking the weather as it comes, through storm and calm), she makes an average of 15 knots, that same ship will on the measured mile make an average of 17½ knots; but that is her maximum speed, and we have estimated that the highest average speed required was 15 knots.

He testifies further in the report that—

The maximum rate of speed in first-class ships, as contemplated in the report, would be 17 and 18 knots on a measured mile, but the average speed would be 15 knots.

And also Mr. Cramp, a distinguished ship-builder, that—

Fifteen knots an hour at sea, in ordinary weather, with full armament and everything on board, as recommended by the advisory board, was equivalent to 17½ or 18 knots on measured mile.

These opinions come from gentlemen of great ability and long experience, and are entitled to the highest consideration. They were expressed long before the Roach contracts were made, and therefore without reference to this trouble.

A few words, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the charges of a personal character that have been urged against the members of the board appointed by Mr. Secretary Whitney, and also against the Secretary himself, by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

These charges, it occurs to me, do not appear to be warranted by anything that has been developed during this controversy, from the beginning to the end. That board, I have been informed, was composed of gentlemen of unimpeachable integrity and of great skill in naval architecture, and I respectfully submit that these charges should have no weight either with this committee or elsewhere, unless supported by better evidence than that offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

As to the desire of the Secretary to reduce Mr. Roach to penury and bankruptcy, I can only say that Mr. Roach himself does not so believe, if confidence is to be placed in the following letter:

NEW YORK, November 3, 1885.

SIR: Your letter of October 1, with draft of proposed agreement relating to the steamship Dolphin, was in due time received, and was entirely satisfactory to me, and I made every effort to have it executed by the sureties on the contract.

For reasons satisfactory to him, one of them declines to unite with me in this. I, therefore, while entertaining the opinion that the agreement does not affect the liability of the sureties, yet am desirous that the agreement should not fail by reason of their refusal to sign, and propose, as consideration to the Government, that from the first moneys coming due me from the Government, arising from other transactions, there be set aside the sum of $25,000 to await the determination of this litigation and to answer any judgment which may be recovered therein.

This in addition to the retention of the balance unpaid upon the Dolphin contract.

It is, however, to be understood that if, at any time pending any future proceedings, the sureties shall sign the proposed agreement, and duly deliver the same, the proviso in said agreement for the retention of $25,000 is annulled, the same being held in lieu of the consent of said sureties.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN ROACH.

Hon. WILLIAM C. WHITNEY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Surely the friends of Mr. Roach should be satisfied. He has expressed himself entirely so.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, with the evidence that is before us, can the committee come to any conclusion other than that the present Secretary has acted wisely and justly throughout this whole matter? As a confidential adviser to the President and as the chief of a great Department of the Government he has, in a practical manner, demonstrated his entire fitness for the honorable, responsible, and onerous position he occupies.

The President made no mistake when selecting him for a membership in his Cabinet, and the House and the country will sustain him in the effort he made, upon his entry into office, to prevent the accomplishment of a great wrong upon the Government.

To him belongs the high honor of first initiating a reform under the present administration, and I trust that he may follow up the good work, whatever the consequences to himself or to others, until his Department becomes restored to that economy, purity, and efficiency, which in former days made our Navy a pride to the American people and an object of emulation and envy to the nations of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I have but a few words to say in reply. The gentleman from Texas, in his attempt to vindicate the Secretary of the Navy from the very damaging charges which have been made against him here to-day, substantiated as they are by official records and incontrovertible documents, has devoted his remarks almost entirely to an arraignment of the advisory board under whose supervision the Dolphin and other vessels of that class were designed and constructed.

I desire to say simply that an arraignment of that advisory board is not an arraignment of the Republican party. It is not an arraignment of the Republican administration except in so far as a Republican administration is responsible for the selection of the officers who constituted that board; and yet I desire to assume for myself as a Republican, and the Republican party of this country ought to be proud to assume, whatever of responsibility there may be in the selection of the personnel of that advisory board, whose superior, I believe, it would have been impossible to have selected either in the United States Navy or in the navies of the world.

I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, to have my attention called in connection with this point to the fact that the Secretary of the Navy in making his report to Congress, in citing the statement of this advisory board, has carefully and scrupulously concealed and suppressed the names of the board, possibly lest the people of the country might find in the names of these distinguished officers an answer in itself to any aspersions which he or others might see fit to cast upon them.

I find this document of the advisory board which they had to submit voluntarily to a Secretary of the Navy who had published broadcast the sweeping criticism which had been made upon them by a board not provided for by any law or regulation—this document, being their review of these adverse findings, was transmitted to the Secretary with a letter to which the signatures of the advisory board were appended; and the Secretary has carefully omitted the letter and the signatures from his report. I will read the names of that advisory board and call the attention of the House and the country to the character, the standing, the record of the men who have been arraigned to-day as naval experts by my distinguished and expert naval friend from the State of Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Edward Simpson, rear-admiral of the United States Navy, president of the board, a man who for a lifetime has honored the records of the Navy not only as a gallant officer but who has enriched the scientific literature of the world, and who to-day stands in this country and in Europe an acknowledged authority upon everything connected with naval architecture or naval ordnance.

The next member of the advisory board was Henry Steers, naval architect. I wonder if the name of that family was ever heard of in Texas? Did the hills and valleys of Alabama ever reverberate with the names of James R. and George Steers, the famous builders of the yacht America, and who put afloat that magnificent specimen of naval architecture the frigate Niagara, in whose presence the ships of the world dipped their colors in compliment to American pre-eminence in grace and beauty of modeling? The son Henry, a grandson of the famous Henry Steers, who built the Shark and Grampus in the olden days, has shown himself worthy of his lineage by designing the finest merchant steamships that ever bore the American flag.

Alexander Henderson, chief engineer of the United States Navy; J. A. Howell, captain, United States Navy; F. M. Barber, lieutenant-commander; F. L. Fernald, naval constructor—these are the men who under the law of Congress were selected by Secretary Chandler to design these new ships for the United States Navy.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I desire just one moment more, for I have been generous with my time and have not very much trenched upon the patience of the House. In conclusion let me say that with a modesty born of some experience in naval and maritime matters, with a caution arising from a knowledge that we are in a transition period in naval architecture and that the building of these steel vessels is our first experiment in that line, with a desire to save the possibilities of legitimate criticism which may arise in the future, I wish to give my judgment, humble though it may be, that the ships designed by that board, the Chicago, the New York, the Atlanta, the Boston, and the Dolphin, will prove as fine vessels of their class as float upon the waters of the globe to-day.

I give my prediction that when the Chicago sails from our shore with the flag of the Union at her peak no member of this House who shall see her, no person who shall meet her in the waters of the world, will be ashamed of that piece of handiwork constructed by American artisans, built in a great American ship-yard, by one of the greatest of American ship-builders, from designs by some of the most eminent men, whose achievements and whose skill have embellished and will continue to reflect honor upon the annals of the American Navy. [Loud applause.]

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. MCADOO. I pause until the other side have ceased to weep over the woes of Mr. John Roach, so eloquently and pathetically depicted by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I had come, in the language of the street, to look upon the case of Mr. Roach as a "chestnut." I thought it was a part of ancient history. I remember very well the Republican party made Mr. Roach and his woes a part of their party platform in the State of New York, and I was well aware that in every Republican newspaper in that State and on every stump where a Republican orator went the great living issue of the day was the persecution of honest John Roach. I have also somewhat of a recollection that when the intelligent people of that great State voted in November they rendered a decisive verdict, adverse to the efforts of the Republican party on behalf of Mr. Roach, among other issues, and, therefore, I was somewhat astonished, knowing the shrewd and astute character of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], and likewise of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], that they should have attempted again on this floor to make a public issue of the question whether the present Secretary has or has not persecuted Mr. Roach. I say this with nothing but respect for Mr. Roach—a self-made man, of determination, pluck, ability, and great enterprise; an excellent type of what a determined, shrewd, industrious man can become under our system of Government.

Now, Mr. Roach is the most singularly successful persecuted man I ever knew. It has been said by our Republican friends that by the conspired and systematic attacks of the wicked Democrats poor Mr. Roach had been driven into bankruptcy. Well, Mr. Roach's bankruptcy was the most successful and prosperous bankruptcy that I have ever read about, for he retired, I understand, with the statement that he was able to pay, I think, $4 for every $1 that he owed, and I am not aware at the present moment that Mr. Roach is suffering for the necessaries of life, though of course, if we are to accept the excited and somewhat exaggerated language of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], poor Mr. Roach, the Atlas who has been carrying the marine interests of the United States upon his devoted shoulders, is today in pecuniary want, stricken with poverty in his declining years, while his wicked persecutor at the other end of the Avenue is reveling in luxury in his so-called gilded palace. This is indeed dramatic!

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the simple facts of the case? There are some difficulties that must suggest themselves to the advocates of Mr. Roach. Mr. Roach, it is said, made a bad bargain; was fooled by the advisory board. Well, if Mr. Roach was the shrewd, careful, able contractor, the great marine-builder of the United States, as his friends claim he was, he would have made a good contract. Great and successful contractors are always careful about such things. But why did Mr. Roach enter into a loosely constructed contract, so slipshod in its provisions? I will tell the gentlemen why. Because Mr. Roach thought the party of the first part, the United States Government, was permanently in the hands of his friends, and that he was dealing with a friendly agent, so that all his blunders and mistakes, if nothing worse, would be forgiven and condoned. If Mr. Roach had been contracting with the present able, honest, upright, vigilant Secretary of the Navy he would have either not entered into the contract, or, if he entered into it, he would have fulfilled it to the letter. That is the whole case.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], after the able and unanswerable argument of my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], sees that he must defend something because somebody has been successfully attacked, and so, with a wise discretion which does him credit, he selects his clients with great care. He does not defend the last administration; he does not defend the administrations that have been expending the people's money on these vessels. Oh, no. He assumes that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has made an attack upon the advisory board. The gentleman from Texas made no attack upon the advisory board, or else I misunderstood him. The gentleman from Texas has successfully shown on this floor that the Dolphin was not constructed in accordance with the contract, leaving the responsibility to fall where it belongs. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has plead guilty for the party in power at that time by failing to defend it and selecting as his objective point the defense of the advisory board.

If the Dolphin was not properly constructed, the fault lies with the administration in power at that time. No one here has attacked the integrity or the military records of the gentlemen who composed the advisory board, and therefore there is no need of this elaborate and spirited defense, no need to recapitulate their services to the Government, and to hold them up as having been subjected to a wanton attack by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. If the gentleman from Maine wants to expend his powers in defense, let him defend the administration of the Government at that period. The advisory board may well say "Save us from our friends." Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I think it is idle at this time to make a defense of the present Secretary of the Navy. He has had in this whole matter an overwhelming and decisive popular verdict in his favor. The case is closed, and no passionate and eloquent appeals addressed to the sensibilities of the people of the United States on behalf of Mr. Roach or the advisory board can make them forget that the facts have been demonstrated to be against the Dolphin and in favor of the Secretary of the Navy. Another charge is brought up here. They say that although the Democratic party pretends to be in favor of upbuilding the Navy quickly, the present Secretary has not taken advantage of the last law passed on that subject to build the three ships authorized to be built, and that, although several months have elapsed, they have not yet been started.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Fourteen months.

Mr. MCADO. Well, say fourteen months. Now, Mr. Chairman, that argument goes too far. That is the strongest argument against the methods pursued by former administrations. Why has not the Secretary of the Navy started the construction of those vessels? Because he is an honest, cautious man, having the expenditure of other people's money, and he has profited by what he found in the Department when he took charge of it. He intends that there shall be no more loosely constructed contracts, and that there shall be delegated to no body of men, however distinguished, the responsibility that belongs to the Department itself.

Mr. GOFF. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MCADOO. I can not yield, because my time is very limited and I have promised a part of it. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Navy intends to see that hereafter the contracts shall be so carefully drawn that no contractor can have any excuse, legal or otherwise, for a failure to build such vessels as Congress authorizes and requires to be constructed.

Mr. GOFF. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Secretary of the Navy in his report to Congress last December stated that in thirty days from that time he would be ready to commence the construction of those vessels.

Mr. MCADOO. That is all right.

Mr. GOFF. Why has he not done it?

Mr. MCADOO. It has taken him all this time, every moment of it, to get the contracts carefully drawn up, to receive all the bids, propositions, and suggestions, and to investigate all the details, and to see to it that the plans are properly perfected. It was the absence of such care that was the difficulty with the gentleman's party friends in administering the Navy Department. That is the rock upon which they came to grief. Their policy was to come to Congress and get some provision in an appropriation bill for the building of a vessel, and then, without the caution and discretion and vigilance which should have characterized them in entering upon such an important matter, to rush off to their friends, the contractors, and give the work into their hands. This change is reform, and if the gentleman does not take kindly to reform it is because he has not been used to it.

Why, I am astonished, Mr. Chairman, at the vim and the passion and the earnestness of gentlemen on the other side in defending the last administrations of the Navy. We all know that the man who was fed upon a diet of crow said he "could stand it, but did not hanker after it." But our friends on the other side actually seem to like it. I thought they were through with trying to make a defense of those methods; and I for one would never resurrect them here on this floor if gentlemen over there had not gone into this defense in extenso of those who have controlled the Navy Department, its methods, and its policy.

Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of making any defense of the gentleman now in charge of that Department. He needs no defense. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] very fairly admitted—and the concession did him credit—that the gentleman now in charge of the Navy Department is an honest, earnest man, trying to do his duty. Sir, he needs no defense here or elsewhere. He has the commendation, and better than that, he has the confidence of the honest people of the United States.

I did not rise for the purpose of entering into any partisan or personal argument. I rose with the view of trying to impress upon this House, outside of all partisan considerations and political advantages, that the bill which follows this should have our support. I am sorry that I do not see here at present my venerable and distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and also my highly respected, able, and good friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], because I intended to address my remarks principally to those gentlemen and to those on this floor who share their sentiments. There is before this House, Mr. Chairman, the most important measure that has been here for many Congresses—I mean the bill to increase the naval establishment. Forgetting the history of the past, leaving out of question such matters of ancient history as how the Navy has been ruined or despoiled or built up, we are confronted with the question, Shall we build up a respectable Navy? Shall we protect our coasts at home and our interests abroad? I say to gentlemen, with no disposition to lecture them, that every member of this House will be held to a personal responsibility by his constituents for his action on this important matter of building new ships. No gentleman on the other side can go home to his constituents and say it was the fault of the Democratic party that these ships were not built; nor can any one on this side go back to his constituents and say it was the obstructive tactics of gentlemen on the other side that prevented the measure. Every member of this House will be brought to a direct responsibility by his constituents if we fail in our great duty in this respect.

What I was about to say, especially to the gentlemen who are unfortunately absent, is this: The naval establishment has always been popular in the United States. The Constitution itself especially fosters two of the armed powers of the Government, the militia and the Navy. Throughout all the debates in the earlier Congresses, throughout the debates of the convention that framed the Constitution, there was shown a spirit of jealousy toward a standing army; but the leading spirits of our Government have always maintained in this House and elsewhere the naval and militia establishments of the country. The Constitution itself in direct terms looks to fostering the Navy, making it incumbent upon Congress that the naval establishment as well as the militia shall be maintained.

Now, I wish to read in this connection a brief extract showing that the Navy is a democratic-republican institution, always popular with the people of the United States. I have before me remarks of Mr. Clay in the debate on the naval establishment in January, 1812. The debate had been running for many days, and a variety of opinions (as is frequently the case in our own times) had been expressed. Mr. Clay took the floor and made these pertinent remarks:

> On this interesting topic a diversity of opinion has existed almost ever since the adoption of the present Government. On the one hand there appeared to him to have been attempts made to precipitate the nation into all the evils of naval extravagance, which had been productive of so much mischief in other countries, and, on the other, strongly feeling this mischief, there has existed an unreasonable prejudice against providing such a competent naval protection for our commercial and maritime rights as is demanded by their importance, and as the increased resources of the country amply justify.
> It appeared to Mr. C. a little extraordinary that so much, as it seemed to him, unreasonable jealousy should exist against the naval establishment. "If," said he, "we look back to the period of the formation of the Constitution it will be found that no such jealousy was then excited. In placing the physical force of the nation at the disposal of Congress the convention manifested much greater apprehension of abuse in the power given to raise armies than in that to provide a navy. In reference to the Navy, Congress is put under no restrictions; but with respect to the Army—that description of force which has been so often employed to subvert the liberties of mankind—they are subjected to limitations designed to prevent the abuse of this dangerous power."
> But the source of alarm is in ourselves. Gentlemen fear that if we provide a marine it will produce collision with foreign nations, plunge us into war, and ultimately overturn the Constitution of the country. Sir, if you wish to avoid foreign collision you had better abandon the ocean, surrender all your commerce, give up all your prosperity. It is the thing protected, not the instrument of protection, that involves you in war. Commerce engenders collision, collision war, and war, the argument supposes, leads to despotism. Would the counsels be deemed wise of that statesman who would recommend that the nation should be unarmed; that the art of war, the martial spirit and martial exercises should be prohibited, and that the great body of the people should be taught that national happiness was to be found in perpetual peace alone? No, sir. And yet every argument in favor of a power of protection on land applies, in some degree, to a power of protection on the sea. Undoubtedly a commerce void of naval protection is more exposed to rapacity than a guarded commerce; and if we wish to invite the continuance of the old or enaction of new, unjust edicts, let us refrain from all exertion upon that element where they operate, and where, in the end, they must be resisted.
> What maritime strength is it expedient to provide for the United States? In considering this subject three different degrees of naval power present themselves. In the first place, such a force as would be capable of contending with that which any other nation is able to bring on the ocean—a force that, boldly scouring every sea, would challenge to combat the fleets of other powers, however great. He admitted it was impossible at this time, perhaps it never would be desirable, for this country to establish so extensive a navy.

What Mr. Clay contended for is now the policy of the Democratic party—not a navy for conquest and invasion, but one for protection and security, advanced, original, modern, moderate, but sufficient.

> The groundless imputation that those who were friendly to a navy were espousing a principle inimical to a freedom should not terrify him. He was not ashamed when in such company as the illustrious author of the Notes on Virginia, whose opinions on the subject of a navy, contained in that work, contributed to the formation of his own. But the principle of a navy, Mr. C. contended, was no longer open to controversy. It was decided when Mr. Jefferson came into power. With all the prejudices against a navy which are alleged by some to have then been brought into the administration—with many honest prejudices, he admitted—the rash attempt was not made to destroy the establishment. It was reduced only to what was supposed to be within the financial capacity of the country. If ten years ago when all those prejudices were to be combatted, even in time of peace, it was deemed proper by the then administration to retain in service ten frigates, he put it to the candor of gentlemen to say if now when we are on the eve of war and taking into view the actual growth of the country and the acquisition of our coast on the Gulf of Mexico we ought not to add to the establishment.

In the views here expressed (and I could now and may at a future time add many more as to the absolute necessity of a respectable, modern, and sufficient navy for the protection of our coast and the maintenance of our dignity and rights in our commercial relations with other countries) Mr. Clay was sustained by George Washington, Mr. Stoddard, Secretary of the Navy in 1798, by the illustrious author of the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson, by Mr. Madison, by Paul Hamilton, and by all those wise, prophetic, and patriotic men who founded our Government, and their immediate successors.

In conclusion, I will say that if in the light of these authorities and in spite of the overwhelming demand of the American people who will not allow us to interpose mere partisan and political questions against a measure of this kind this Congress should fail to appropriate for building up the American Navy, it will have been derelict in its duty and unfaithful to a great and honorable trust.

I yield whatever time I may have remaining to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, in those two minutes I desire simply to say this dispute about the Dolphin arose largely out of the indefiniteness of the term sea-speed used in the contract. And while that was the point upon which the whole controversy hinged, yet the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] omitted it from his speech. And while it was plain sailing to leave that out, he would have had some difficulty to get over it if he had put it in.

The Secretary of the Navy appointed a board to advise him what he should do. There was a duty imposed on the advisory board. It was said this contract must be executed to the satisfaction of the Secretary. These three gentlemen were appointed as advisers. After the failure of Mr. Roach the Secretary took possession, as any prudent man would do, of this vessel built with Government funds. He believed he was right. The assignees, on the other hand, believed Roach was right in his claim—that is, we will give them that credit. The Secretary invited them to sue him and let the Court of Claims decide between them and the Government. They refused, thus indicating clearly they feared to trust this question about which we have heard so much to the Court of Claims.

I hope this question will be settled very soon. An offer has been made which it is probable the Secretary of the Navy will accept.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as we have finished the political part of the discussion on this bill, I hope we will now be permitted to take it up section by section for amendment. And I hope we will take it up in a business manner and in the same spirit in which both sides in the committee-room, Democrats and Republicans, united in preparing it and making it a fair and honest bill. It comes to the House with but few points of difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time set for general debate has expired, and the bill will now be read by sections for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the naval service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes:

Pay of the Navy: For the pay of officers on sea-duty; officers on shore and other duty; officers on waiting orders; officers on the retired-list; admiral's and vice-admiral's secretaries; clerks to commandants of yards and stations; clerks to paymasters at yards and stations; inspections; receiving-ships and other vessels; extra pay to men re-enlisting under honorable discharge; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men in the engineers' force, and for the Coast Survey service and Fish Commission, seven thousand five hundred men and seven hundred and fifty boys, at the pay prescribed by law; in all $6,312,707.26.

Mr. HERBERT. I move after line 20 to insert the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

Besides which the sum of $576,380 of surplus which went to the credit of the pay of the Navy is hereby reappropriated and made available.

Mr. HERBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I endeavored yesterday in the remarks I submitted on this bill to explain to the House how this became necessary. At the time we prepared the bill we went upon the construction given to the law of 1874, but a few days ago a decision was made by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, whose opinion had been asked, differing from that rendered by First Comptroller Lawrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the character of that latter decision?

Mr. RANDALL. It is contained in the letter of the Second Comptroller, and I suggest it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HERBERT. I am willing it should be printed in the RECORD. In 1874 a law was passed which provided at the end of two years all appropriations not used should lapse into the Treasury, but a proviso made certain exceptions in favor of the continuance of permanent appropriations, and named specifically appropriations for pay of the Navy and pay of the Marine Corps. Under Secretary Sherman and Secretary Folger and Secretary McCulloch, in reference to the law of 1874 First Comptroller Lawrence held the surplus on hand remaining from the pay of the Navy after one year might be applied to the payment of any indebtedness of any year whatever. Under the recent decision reappropriation is necessary. That is the whole of it.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the printing of the decision in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. It is follows:

PAY OF THE NAVY AND THE MARINE CORPS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 29, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 27th instant inviting attention to the appropriations for pay of the Navy and Marine Corps contained in H. R. 8975, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year 1887, and requesting to be informed whether, should the sums named under the heads mentioned prove insufficient to meet the pay of the Navy and Marine Corps accruing during the fiscal year 1887, any unexpended balance remaining of the appropriations for 1886 and for prior years for the same purposes would, under the provisions of section 3690 Revised Statutes, as modified by the act of June 20, 1874 (18 Stat., 110), be available to meet the resulting deficiency or whether such balance could be applied only to "pay" accruing in the fiscal years for which the appropriations were specifically made.

In reply thereto I inclose herewith copy of a communication from the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, to whom the matter had been referred for decision, in which he holds that the annual appropriation for pay of the Navy and Marine Corps is available only for the fiscal year for which it is made.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 29, 1886.

SIR: I am in receipt of a letter addressed to the acting Secretary by Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, chairman Committee on Appropriations, dated May 27, 1886, inclosing a copy of H. R. bill 8975, making appropriations for the naval service for 1887, and inviting attention to the contemplated appropriations therein on pages 1 and 2 for the pay of the Navy, and on page 20 for pay of the Marine Corps, and requesting to be informed whether, "should the sums named under the heads mentioned, prove insufficient to meet the pay of the Navy and of the Marine Corps accruing during the fiscal year 1887, any unexpended balance remaining of the appropriations for 1886 and prior years for the same purposes would, under the provisions of section 3690, R. S., as modified by the act of June 20, 1874, S. at L., vol. 18, page 110, be available to meet the resulting deficiency, or whether such balance could be applied only to 'pay' accruing in the fiscal years for which the appropriations were specifically made."

This question having been referred to the Second Comptroller for decision, by indorsement of the honorable Assistant Secretary, upon the letter above named of May 27, I have the honor to say that, in my opinion, under the provisions of the several statutes relating to the subject, if the H. R. bill referred to should become a law and the appropriations therein made for the pay of the Navy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, should prove insufficient for that purpose, any unexpended balances remaining of appropriations for 1886 and prior years would not be properly available to meet the deficiency.

Section 3678 of the Revised Statutes provides that all sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others.

Section 3979 prohibits any Department of the Government from expending, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year.

Section 3690 requires all balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year, and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year, to be applied solely to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year; and balances not needed for such purposes shall be carried to the surplus fund.

It is, however, provided that this section shall not apply to appropriations known as permanent or indefinite appropriations.

These permanent or indefinite appropriations are specified in sections 3687, 3688, and 3689 of the Revised Statutes, and do not include the annual appropriations for the pay of the Navy.

In 1874, by section 5 of chapter 328, Congress enacted that after July 1, 1874, the Secretary of the Treasury should annually cause all unexpended balances of appropriations which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury; but it was provided that this provision should not apply to permanent specific appropriations or to other designated appropriations, among which was included the pay of the Navy and Marine Corps; but it was declared that these appropriations should "continue available until otherwise ordered by Congress."

The plain import of this declaration is that the annual appropriation for the pay of the Navy and Marine Corps was to continue available for the purpose for which it was appropriated, and for no other purpose; that is, for the pay of the Navy and Marine Corps for the fiscal year for which the appropriation was made. The appropriation was not thereby made permanent or indefinite, and was not thereby brought within the provisions of statute applicable to such appropriations.

It was simply made continuously available without limit as to time, until otherwise ordered by Congress, for the purpose or object for which it was made, to wit, for the pay of the naval establishment for the current year.

I am aware that a different construction has been given to this statute and that a practice has grown up in the Department of carrying the unexpended balances of appropriations for the pay of the Navy at the end of each fiscal year to the credit of the appropriation for the succeeding year and merging it therein, but it is contrary to the general scheme of the statute upon the subject and to the obvious intent of Congress in the passage of the act of 1874, and it is not difficult to perceive how its continuance may lead to embarrassment and confusion, and even injustice in some cases.

Claims are frequently presented to the accounting officers by persons who are, or have been, in the naval service, or their heirs, for pay justly due them for services rendered many years prior to the filing of the claim, and for the payment of which Congress had made an adequate appropriation and had declared in the act of 1874 that the appropriation should continue available indefinitely for the payment of such claims.

Upon the allowance of the claim it can be immediately paid if this provision of law is observed; but if the unexpended balance of the appropriation for that year has been applied to meet deficiencies in the annual appropriations for the pay of the Navy for subsequent years, it is evident that it is no longer available for the purpose for which it was originally intended, and the claimant is deprived of the money to which he is clearly entitled, and must await the pleasure of Congress before he can be paid.

Very respectfully,

I. H. MAYNARD, Comptroller.

Hon. C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. This practice grew up under a decision to which the gentleman has alluded, but the appropriation always embraced, by detail and in the aggregate, a sufficient amount to meet that expenditure. The amendment of the gentleman, of course, is necessary under this decision so as to make available that balance. It has got to be disposed of in some manner, either to go back into the Treasury or be reappropriated. I would like this opinion to go into the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it would be better to carry out the theory of the statute to which the chairman of the committee has alluded. Let this surplus lapse or return it to the Treasury and then appropriate here the sum actually required to be used in the coming fiscal year for this purpose. What is the objection to that plan?

It was certainly the intention of Congress when it provided that the surplus should be turned into the Treasury; and in the absence of any legislation that will be the result. I am of the opinion, therefore, that we should provide now for the actual needs of the service for the coming year independently of past appropriations, and then by virtue of law this surplus will return to the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to hear from the chairman of the committee as to whether or not the amount appropriated in the bill and this reappropriation added together will equal the estimates?

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir; but it is admitted to be sufficient for the service for the next fiscal year. I explained all that on yesterday.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman's speech is not in this morning's RECORD, and consequently I have had no opportunity, not being here when he delivered it, of hearing his explanation of this branch of the subject.

Mr. HERBERT. It was explained very fully on yesterday. In reply to my colleague, however, from West Virginia, I know of no reason why in this case we should depart from the usual and ordinary method of reappropriating a fund which, like this, has been left over from the preceding appropriations.

On yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], whom I do not now see in his seat, went off on that subject, I think, without reflection, when he used the rather harsh word in criticising this method as stealing, the stealing of one appropriation for another. Now, knowing that this has been very commonly acted upon, I took occasion to look at the bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations when he was the chairman of that committee in the Forty-seventh Congress, and I find it was not unusual to adopt this plan. For instance, in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, on page 33, provision is made there for the supervising surgeons, and this language is used:

The same to be paid from the permanent appropriations for the Marine-Hospital Service.

Again, in another bill from that committee—and I only take one example from each bill, although they are numerous—making appropriation for the sundry civil expenses of the Government, on page 9 it provided—

That any balance of appropriations for repairs and preservation of public buildings in Alaska, under the act of March 3, 1881, for the service of the Government for the fiscal year 1882, which remains unexpended on the 30th June, 1882, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the original purpose.

Again, in the Navy bill it will be found:

And any unexpended balances of appropriations for this purpose for the fiscal year 1882 is hereby reappropriated and made available on account of this service for this fiscal year.

Again, in the bill to provide for deficiencies, on page 3:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer of the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department, miscellaneous items for 1882, so much as may be required to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department, fuel, &c., not exceeding the sum of $3,200.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the general practice, and there is no reason for departing from it now. This fund is here; it is subject to appropriation by Congress; it was appropriated for this purpose, and the amount has accumulated year after year, and it is the judgment of the committee that we should thus utilize it.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to state that the complaint of the gentleman from New York, as I understood him, was mainly for taking and using a fund without reappropriating it. He did not complain of reappropriating it, but simply of the manner in which it appeared in this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I so understood his objection.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I think, in justice to the gentleman from New York, who is now absent, that it is proper to say that his position, as I understood it, was that stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he found no provision in this bill reappropriating the surplus to which the chairman of the committee has called attention, and, in the absence of a provision of that kind, that the same would not be available during the coming year.

Now, I have no serious objection to the amendment, but I think it would be better to go about it in the regular way. I know that there have been instances in the past where that course has been pursued, but it would be better, in my opinion, to let the law of 1874 be carried out, and let the sum revert to the Treasury, so that each bill will state the exact amount of the appropriation. Of course, however, if the chairman of the committee prefers otherwise I shall not contend for this position.

Mr. HERBERT. Perhaps that was the position of the gentleman from New York; but I did not so understand him at the time, and especially as I tried to explain in his hearing that I would offer the amendment to meet this point. However, if he was present he would probably let this go.

Mr. GOFF. The gentleman's statement made on yesterday was very full, but there was very much of it which we were unable to hear on account of the confusion prevailing. I am frank to say that I did not hear his explanation of this matter.

The amendment of Mr. HERBERT was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Pay, miscellaneous:

For commission and interest; transportation of funds; exchange; mileage to officers while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers while traveling abroad under orders, and for traveling expenses of apothecaries, yeomen, and civilian employés, and for actual and necessary traveling expenses of naval cadets while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as cadets, and for the payment of any such officers as may be in service, either upon the active or retired list, during the year ending June 30, 1887, in excess of the numbers of each class provided for in this act, and for any increase of pay arising from different duty, as the needs of the service may require; for rent and furniture of buildings and offices not in navy-yards; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, boards of investigation, examining boards, with clerks' and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; stationery and recording; expenses of purchasing-paymasters' offices of the various cities, including clerks, furniture, fuel, stationery, and incidental expenses; newspapers and advertising; foreign postage; telegraphing, foreign and domestic; telephones; copying; care of library; mail and express wagons, ferriage, tolls, and livery and express fees; costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress; canal tolls and pilotage; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; care and transportation of the dead; reports, professional investigation, cost of special instruction at home or abroad, including maintenance of students, and information from abroad, and the collection and classification thereof, $225,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if he can give the House any information as to how much of the fund appropriated in this paragraph is likely to be used for the purchase of plans or information from abroad. I understand that during the last year there has been quite an expenditure from this fund of "pay miscellaneous" for the purchase of plans or designs of engines in England. It has been said that $25,000 were expended for that purpose, and I have heard it estimated as high as $65,000.

Now, inasmuch as it has not been the policy of the administration to furnish any compensation or bounty or premium or payment for plans furnished by American designers, I am somewhat interested to know how much of this sum was expended for this purpose last year, so that we may form an idea how much may be appropriated from this fund for similar purposes this year.

And in this connection I would like to ask the chairman further whether his information agrees with mine, to the effect that this purchase of designs abroad has been without any special utility thus far; that these designs and draughts of engines have not been used; that the designing and preparation of plans for the new cruisers are going forward upon a basis decided upon prior to the purchase of these foreign plans and are proceeding without any modification arising from a study of those plans, further than that the action of the Bureau of Steam Engineering might be modified by the general information which they at all times seek to obtain from abroad; whether it is the fact that those plans have proved defective in many important particulars and inferior to the designs which are being carried forward in our own department. I would like at this point to have any information the chairman of the committee may be able to give on this subject.

Mr. HERBERT. I will state to my colleague I am unable to inform him how much money has been devoted to the purchase of information of this kind from abroad. But I will state if there has been any considerable sum there is less appropriated under this head in this bill than was appropriated last year, and so the expense from that source will not be so great. I do know that plans have been purchased abroad of a vessel, the Na-ni-wa-kan, built by Armstrong & Co., said to be a modern vessel of the very finest and best type. What use the Secretary has put that to I do not know. But he is very wisely endeavoring to avail himself of the experience which has been purchased abroad at very great cost, and is seeking to give to those under him who are devising these new ships and new engines every possible facility which can be laid before them so that they may make no mistake.

Mr. PETERS. Is this money expended with the view of securing designs from abroad, or to pay for designs actually purchased?

Mr. HERBERT. They are purchased for information to be used by our designers of ships and engines, so as to enable the Navy Department to build the best possible type of ship.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am speaking of the designs for engines.

Mr. HERBERT. My remarks apply not only to engines, but to ships.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How much does the gentleman understand has been expended for that purpose?

Mr. HERBERT. I have stated that I could not tell the amount. The figures have never been given. I know, as the gentleman from Maine knows, that we have made a very considerable reduction in this item, so that there will not be as large a fund to draw upon for this purpose for the next year if this bill passes in its present form as there is now.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understand that, but I do not understand that hitherto there have been these expenditures for plans and designs of machinery purchased abroad. I do not think that has been so hitherto.

Mr. HERBERT. Possibly not; but it ought to have been.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am rather ignorant about this matter, because the Secretary has given us no information in detail, but the complaint has been made to me personally by American designers and draughtsmen that they have been called upon by the Department for plans and designs, and that when they furnish them they have to bear the entire expense, receiving no compensation whatever. They complain of a policy which, while it furnishes no encouragement to American talent, goes abroad and expends large sums of money for plans and designs made by foreign architects—designs which have not been utilized, as I understand, and which I have what I regard as good authority for saying have proved in many important particulars defective. It seems to me that if this appropriation of "pay miscellaneous" is to be utilized for the purpose of obtaining designs and plans for improving the construction of our engines and vessels, there should be some arrangement made whereby a portion of the money provided by the people for the purpose of obtaining improved designs should be offered for competition among American designers.

Mr. HERBERT. I did not suppose, Mr. Chairman, that my colleague would object for a moment to the Secretary taking every possible precaution to get the very best plans and to build the very best ships, and I see he does not. But the ground of his complaint is the difference between the treatment of the American contractor and the foreigner. Now, if the gentleman will think a moment, he will see that that objection is unfounded for this reason: The law under which these ships are being built (and we do not contemplate changing it in any bill that we have before us) is that they shall be built in America, so that when an American sends in a design for a ship, if it is accepted, he has a chance to bid for the construction of the vessel and make his money on that; but no foreigner can hope for any such thing. Therefore, all we can do, and all that the Secretary has done, is to buy the plans of the very best ships that are afloat and the very best engines that move them. I think, and I have no doubt this House will think, that is a very wise course of conduct on the part of the Secretary.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My friend the chairman of the committee will do me the justice to admit that if we are not now in danger of buying ships or engines abroad it is not the fault of certain gentlemen who might be named if the rules of the House would permit, and it is not at all certain that the action of the House in the consideration of this bill may not be diverted back to a line of policy which has been advocated in quarters I am not permitted to name, a policy which might enable foreign contractors to build some of our engines, if not some of our ships.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling attention to this section and the one that follows. Two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars is here appropriated for "miscellaneous" purposes. These purposes are grouped, but they are not specified, and, taken together, they make a large group with a large sum applicable to the whole group. Now, I want to ask the chairman of the committee in whose discretion is the distribution of this appropriation.

Mr. SAYERS. This character of appropriation has always been in this form.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Who has control of the disbursement or distribution of this miscellaneous appropriation?

Mr. SAYERS. This kind of appropriation is always in this form. There never has been an itemized appropriation under this head.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I like the plan of itemized appropriations as recommended by Jefferson in 1801.

Mr. SAYERS. It would be scarcely possible to follow it in this case.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I see the difficulty; but my question is still unanswered as to who has control of distributing this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the compensation of the two civilian members of the naval advisory board for the time they may serve after June 30, 1886, at the rate of $2,500 each for six months, and of $250 each for traveling and other expenses for six months, $5,500: Provided, That the sum accepted by them under this act shall be in full of all services rendered after June 30, 1886.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether the last clause in the paragraph just read is not open to the point of order which was sustained on the legislative bill, that it is new legislation?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I make the point of order that the words in lines 59, 60, and 61, "that the sum accepted by them under this act shall be in full of all services rendered after June 30, 1886," is new legislation, fixing the salaries of these officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Maine if there is any law fixing these salaries?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I presume so. I have made the point of order for the purpose of bringing out the facts.

Mr. HERBERT. There is no law.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If there is no law, how can the law be made in this appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to be informed whether there is any law fixing the salaries?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am unable to answer the question, but I understand the chairman of the committee to say there is not.

Mr. HERBERT. The law on which this item is based provided for two civilian members of the naval advisory board, but did not provide any compensation for them after the 30th of June of the present year. It was supposed that they would get through with their duties before that time, but it happens that they will be needed for some time longer, and therefore this provision was put in the bill that they be paid at this rate with the proviso that the sum they accepted under this bill should be in full payment for their services after the 30th of June.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that there is no law fixing these salaries, and therefore overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For preparing and engraving on copper plates the surveys of the Mexican coast, and for publishing charts of the coast from San Francisco to Panama, $10,000.

Mr. BUCK. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the provision which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs and improvements on naval war college buildings; heating, lighting, and furniture for same; books and stationery, freight, and other contingent expenses; facing college building with Portland cement; purchase of food and maintenance of horses and mail wagons and attendance on same; clerk to commandant or senior officer, and attendant on buildings; in all, $8,000.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment at this point, because it is the most natural place for the amendment to come in, and it is the place where it was originally put in the bill when first draughted, as well as in the estimates.

As I stated yesterday, this college was started in 1884. Since the debate of yesterday I have ascertained that the order of Secretary Chandler establishing this college, and which was dated October, 1884, was based upon the authority of an act of Congress passed in 1882, for the acceptance of Coaster's Harbor Island, near Newport, in the following language:

And the cession by the State of Rhode Island to the United States of said island for use as a naval training station is hereby accepted.

That is the authority of law for the establishment of this college. In the discussion yesterday it was stated that this college should be united with the school at Annapolis; but, Mr. Chairman, as was then suggested, to locate this school there would unnaturally mix up what is in a certain sense a primary school for naval cadets with this school which is designed for post-graduates, that is, for officers of the Navy who have been in service for some years and who may wish to pursue an advanced course of study in an institution not connected with the Annapolis Academy.

I hope my colleagues on the committee and my friends on the other side will not insist that we shall in this summary way blot out an institution which seems to promise to do so much good. If we destroy this institution why not destroy the torpedo station which was established for a similar purpose in connection with the Ordnance Department? Why not take the torpedo station and all other auxiliary institutions of the Navy Department, as well as the naval war college, and put them in one place, at Annapolis?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the mere statement of the case is enough to convince any gentleman who will give any attention to the subject that it would be most unwise and injudicious for us now, without proper consideration or thought, to omit to appropriate for this institution, which is calculated to be so useful. I hope gentlemen here will not insist upon destroying this institution so early in its life. Nothing can be said against it. It has been successful up to this time. Nothing can be said against the locality where the school is established. It seems to me that if gentlemen will look into this matter with any sort of care they will agree with me that it is altogether too early to condemn this school before it has had a fair chance to demonstrate its utility.

I will say in passing that almost all the officers and others connected with the Navy who take advantage of this school are men who have been for many years in the service. They are not boys or young men, but for the most part middle-aged men, who have grown up in the service and desire from natural taste or inclination to pursue some particular course of study. It is true that without any college a great many men having a natural taste for a particular branch of study will pursue it alone and unaided, and in this way may often develop great capacity and efficiency. But who does not know that a school where such persons may go and have the aid of lectures and experiments is of the greatest benefit? I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be favorably considered by the committee.

One word in conclusion. I have in this amendment named $8,000 as the aggregate appropriation for this purpose. The estimate was for $14,000; but thinking that possibly some gentleman might consider $14,000 an extravagant appropriation, I have named in the amendment $8,000, the amount appropriated for this college last year. The small amount proposed must obviate, I think, any possible charge of extravagance.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Chairman, the interest of my State in the United States Navy is something more than a sentiment. We of Rhode Island claim, founding our faith upon authentic history, that within our waters the American Navy was born. We furnished the first "commander-in-chief," so called, of the American Navy in the war of the Revolution. We furnished that great naval commander Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry, and scores of other gallant officers, who have largely contributed to the success and deserved fame of our national Navy.

The people of my State have, and have always had, a lively interest in our Navy, and an earnest, patriotic desire for its proper support.

The State of Rhode Island, with what I might almost term munificent liberality, donated to the United States Coasters' Harbor Island, at Newport, a most valuable and eligibly located piece of property, for naval purposes. That donation was accepted by the Government, as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] has already said, by act approved August 7, 1882. The building on this island is the one for the necessary repair and improvement of which the appropriation now proposed is required.

I have not time in the brief period allotted to me to go largely into the consideration of this matter; but I do desire to say that the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE] stands perhaps alone when he undertakes to argue that Newport is not the proper place for the war college, and that it should be established in connection with the Naval Academy at Annapolis. The naval board which was appointed to examine concerning the location of this war college reported unanimously in favor of its present location. I will annex to my remarks a quotation from their report which I have not time now to read.

That location has been commended and approved by the preceding Secretary of the Navy as well as by the present Secretary. The institution and its work are also strongly indorsed by the Admiral of the Navy, as appears by his report now before me. Rear-Admiral Luce, who has charge of the war college, is earnestly in favor of maintaining it at the present location.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GOFF. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps I can not better answer those who object to the naval war college than by quoting from the report of the Admiral of the Navy for the present year.

He says:

The naval war college of to-day is but the beginning of an institution that will in the future, I believe, confer great benefit on the service.

There are some officers who retard its progress by their opposition, yet no one can give a single good reason why such an institution should not be maintained.

I have had as much to do with graduates from the Naval Academy as any one, and I do not hesitate to say that the academic course does not and can not thoroughly prepare an officer for all the high duties he will be called upon to perform.

If I were selecting officers in time of war I should certainly give the preference to those who had gone through a course at the torpedo school and war college, for the reason that in the studies which young officers will pursue at these post-graduate institutions they will have brought before them in practical form many things that they had previously only learned theoretically, and perhaps indistinctly remembered.

A naval officer of the present day to be eminent in his profession must be a constant student, and where could he have such an opportunity of becoming acquainted with all the improvements, modifications, and experiences in the art of war as by a course of study at the war college? Officers of the Navy should seek all sources of information to fit themselves for the high duties of the future. Those who oppose this school because they can no longer benefit by it, or for other undefined reasons unworthy of consideration, should be content to let the Navy Department exercise its own judgment in the matter and not endeavor to throw obstacles in the way of a valuable institution.

No good reason can be advanced why our naval officers should not have an opportunity of perfecting themselves in professional matters, which will at least keep them on an equality with officers in foreign navies.

I consider that the education received by cadets at the Naval Academy is merely the groundwork to fit them for what they will have to learn practically in the future.

As the war college is made more attractive to students by the consideration of interesting professional subjects—on which few young officers are sufficiently well informed—it will afford full instruction in professional science, and impart that general information without which a naval officer can not be considered fully qualified to supervise the important matters which constantly claim his attention.

The naval war college was instituted, and is intended, for the instruction of officers who have already served at sea. It is not intended for naval cadets in continuance of the academic course, but for officers pursuing an advanced course of study and for the practical application of science and theory, analogous in its methods of instruction to those pursued at the torpedo station. Those best qualified to judge concur in the opinion that the separation of the war college and the academy is for the interest and advantage of both.

I believe I can not better conclude my remarks than by referring to a statement made by Rear-Admiral Luce, in a letter to myself, which I will print with my remarks. It strongly corroborates what I have said in the few minutes at my command, and presents the claims of the naval war college for maintenance in its present location clearly and strongly.

The appropriation proposed should certainly be granted, and the course of instruction maintained which promises so much to increase the efficiency of the Navy.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his last annual report, says:

The naval war college began its first session September 3, under the direction of Rear-Admiral Stephen B. Luce, president of the college. The instruction consisted of lectures on military science, the art of naval warfare, and marine international law. The college, now fairly in operation, by giving officers an advanced course of instruction on subjects directly connected with the most important duties of the profession, fills what has hitherto been a serious want in our system of naval education.

The previous Secretary of the Navy, responding to a Senate resolution of inquiry, February 11, 1885, said:

As it was deemed advisable that the course of study should be made to supplement the present instruction of naval officers in torpedoes at Newport, R. I., and that the place should be selected where the Department is already in possession of the necessary grounds and buildings, the board recommended the establishment of the college of instruction at Newport.

* * * * * * *

The reasons which have controlled the action of the Department are to be found in the recognized necessity for an advanced course of military and naval education in the United States. There are now existing three schools for the purpose in the Army and one in the Navy. The latter is at the torpedo station at Newport, where a class of officers is assembled for a few months in each year for instruction in the art of manufacturing and using torpedoes and torpedo explosives. The constant changes in the methods of conducting naval warfare imposed by the introduction of armored ships, swift cruisers, rams, sea-going torpedo-boats, and high-power guns, together with the more rigid methods of treating the various subjects belonging to naval science, render imperative the establishment of a school where our officers may be enabled to keep abreast of the improvements going on in every navy in the world. The torpedo school only partially fulfills the imperative requirements. The college is intended to complete the curriculum by adding to an extent never heretofore undertaken the study of naval warfare and international law and their cognate branches.

The great surplus of officers in the Navy makes it especially appropriate to require that at all times some of them not needed for actual duty shall be engaged in courses of professional study calculated to improve and qualify them for better service in the future.

In instituting this school of instruction at Coasters' Harbor Island, the Department, acting within the scope of its powers, has simply utilized public grounds and buildings under its own immediate control for a wise and beneficial purpose, and has detailed public officers who can readily be spared to constitute the president and faculty of the college.

Very little expense will be incurred in carrying out the Department's plan, while the benefits to be realized by the Navy and the country will be of great importance. The subject is commended to the notice and favor of Congress.

The question of location was thoroughly considered by the board of naval officers to whom the same was submitted, who reported strongly in favor of Newport as affording the most advantageous site, and, referring to Coasters' Harbor Island, said:

Newport possesses a site at which the school could be permanently established, and where there is little probability that its welfare would clash with any other interest of the service. The torpedo station is already at this place, and it would be possible to so extend its facilities that the instruction in physical science might be given—although this would entail a considerable outlay for buildings, apparatus, &c., as well as a yearly expenditure for instructors. As practical exercises afloat ought to constitute a part of the course at the war school, Newport offers exceptional advantages.

The following is the letter of Rear-Admiral Luce referred to:

UNITED STATES NAVAL WAR COLLEGE,
Newport, R. I., May 26, 1886.

SIR: I take the liberty of calling your attention to the fact that the Naval Committee has failed to include this college in the naval appropriation bill.

The cause of this omission, I am led to infer, is on account of some supposed advantages in favor of some other place for the location of the college.

But I would point out to you that the college, as now established, had the full sanction of the Navy Department, has the indorsement of the Secretary of the Navy in his recent annual report, the advocacy of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and the warm support of the distinguished Admiral of the Navy.

This place was deliberately chosen by a board of officers convened for the special purpose of reporting on the subject of a post-graduate course; and in settling upon Coasters' Harbor Island they were governed by what was believed to be for the best interests of the service.

The recommendations of the board were approved by the Secretary of the Navy, and have already been carried into effect.

To withhold an appropriation now with a view to reversing the deliberate conclusions of those who have brought the college up to its present state of usefulness and by that means endeavor to strangle in its infancy an institution so full of promise exhibits a feeling of unfriendliness to the Navy which I can not believe the Naval Committee on further consideration will sustain.

I have heard indirectly that certain irresponsible parties have suggested a crude, ill-digested plan of combining this college with the Naval Academy, to the great detriment of the latter. But what advantage can possibly be claimed for such a step that would overbalance the injury that would result to both establishments? Not one. It has been urged that the college would have the advantage of the Naval Academy library. But the college has its own library, which has been carefully selected with special regard to its needs, and it wants no other.

Furthermore, the curriculum of studies, the routine, the manner of carrying on the instruction, and the discipline are all so dissimilar at the two establishments that it would be difficult to imagine a more incongruous arrangement.

Two of the graduates of the Naval Academy, whose predilections would naturally lead them to favor their Alma Mater, have attached their official signatures to the report recommending the present location for the post-graduate course; and Lieut. C. G. Calkins, another graduate, in an essay on the higher education of naval officers, an essay which received the highest prize of the Naval Institute, uses the following emphatic language in regard to a post-graduate course:

"The extension of the usefulness of naval officers has recently become a matter of vital importance to the naval service of the future.

* * * * * * *

"It may be urged that the establishment of post-graduate courses at the Naval Academy would satisfy all the conditions requisite for success. But the object of the plan being to secure varied attainments, the limited range of branches for which the Naval Academy offers advantages will not be sufficient for all. Many of the officers who take these advanced courses will hereafter be instructors at the Naval Academy. To secure the best results they should be brought into contract with broader methods and ideas than can be fully applied in that institution. In-and-in breeding never succeeds in the long run, but fresh blood is needed in every system to secure soundness and vigor.

"The practical difficulties due to differences in age and rank would also be felt. Uniformity in treatment and the restraints of discipline necessary in such a school can not readily be applied to officers of various grades and acquirements. They might be found obstructive to earnest students and irritating to men of mature years. The class system does not apply to the objects proposed. The association of a number of young officers might result in the establishment of an easy routine of study, or, if competition were introduced to prevent this, might repeat or intensify some of the animosities and injustices with which former unfair competitions have afflicted some grades in the service." (United States Naval Institute, vol. 9, No. 2, 1883.)

If the reasoning which would confine an advanced course of studies for naval officers to the Naval Academy be sound, then not only should the torpedo school be sent from Newport to Annapolis but the artillery school at Fort Monroe and the cavalry and infantry school at Fort Leavenworth should be sent to West Point. But such a preposterous idea has never been even suggested.

General Tidball, the present very efficient commandant of the artillery school, said that West Point would be the very last place for such a school. In reference to the then proposed establishment of the war college he said: "As regards locality I think Annapolis, notwithstanding the advantages of the academy library, would be the least desirable of any from the fact that it brings the instruction of the maturer officers into juxtaposition with that of the more juvenile cadets, two entirely distinct classes, requiring different methods and different treatment."

This evidence is exceedingly valuable, as coming from an officer of large experience in the management of a post-graduate school.

General Tidball's views were those subsequently adopted by the board on the post-graduate course. (See Senate Ex. Doc. No. 68, Forty-eighth Cong., second session, page 6.)

It is to be regretted that the views of the board, so carefully and conscientiously worked out, should have been set aside. Every new undertaking will provoke opposition. There are those who, unwilling to build up, will gladly assist in pulling down; others will joyfully embarrass the workers out of merewantonness. This is only to be expected. It is only the few who are just enough to let those most interested in, and responsible for, an enterprise be intrusted with its success.

I sincerely trust that the opinions of these few may have weight with the Naval Committee and with the House in regard to an appropriation for the maintenance of this college.

I may say, in conclusion, that I have written a letter of similar import to Hon. CHARLES A. BOUTELLE, member of Congress.

Very truly, yours,

S. B. LUCE,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy, President of College.

Hon. HENRY J. SPOONER,
United States House of Representatives.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I understand the location of this college is a very nice place as a pleasure resort, in fact it is a very beautiful summer resort. The Committee on Naval Affairs had various persons before them to testify in reference to this college, among others Admiral Luce himself; and we came to the conclusion that the only difference so far as the advantages are concerned between Annapolis and the place where the naval war college is established is that the sea breeze is probably more delightful than at Annapolis; and that is about all. We had the superintendent of the Naval Academy before us, one of the most distinguished officers in the Navy, and one of the finest scholars in the country, who testified upon this point, and he tells us that it is within the power of the Naval Academy at Annapolis to furnish what may be termed a post-graduate course, as a course for officers who have been already in the service without much expense. He said that there was a building there which had been completed for the Government some time since, a large building sufficient for the purpose, and that a very slight appropriation, in order to put it in repair, was all that was necessary. The Naval Academy also has already the apparatus that is necessary; it has a steam-engine there, and a very fine library, and all the facilities necessary for these officers to perfect themselves in a course of professional training in all of the branches that could be taught at the war college.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. GROUT. According to the authority of Commodore Luce, in charge of the war college, there are none of the appliances and literary books at the Annapolis academy such as are required at this naval war college. They have there their own machinery and appliances and experimental instruments of the very best quality. Now, of course, you can take them and bring them to Annapolis, but they are not at Annapolis now.

Mr. SAYERS. That is just what we propose to do. Everything at the college belongs to the Government, and in the opinion of the committee it will be less expense to move the property suitable for educational purposes to the Naval Academy than to keep up the naval war college. True it has not cost much up to this time, but it is only the grain of mustard-seed; it will grow and grow and grow until the birds of the air can rest upon its branches; and it will develop larger and larger until it becomes a great wide-spreading bay-tree under which all of the officers can lie down and refresh themselves in its shade. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROUT. How can it grow and grow beyond the requirements, which are not excessive? It has not proved itself to be an expensive institution up to this time.

Mr. SPOONER. With the permission of the House I desire to say that the expenses are certainly not greater for the maintenance of this institution where it is now than if it was at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, or any other place, because the buildings are already there at Coasters' Harbor Island, and certainly the moderate expenditure that has been asked thus far for the support of the institution is not excessive. But a very moderate amount is required to continue it if appropriated, and no more than would be appropriated for the college if it was located at any other point.

Mr. LORE. My friend means the nucleus of buildings is there; but the buildings will have to be extended.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a large building, which simply needs repairs, already there.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it proposed to maintain there at public expense a thoroughly equipped college?

Mr. GROUT. Only for that purpose.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WOLFORD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. JOHNSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate requested the return of the bill (H. R. 544) granting leaves of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 36.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completing the reduction of the observations of the transit of Venus, to be expended under the direction of the Transit of Venus Commission, $3,000.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am instructed by the committee to move an amendment striking out certain lines which have been just read and inserting what I send to the desk, which is merely a change of phraseology.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 110, 111, 112, and insert:

"For the completion and other expenses connected with the report of the observations of the transit of Venus, in 1874 and 1882, to be expended under the direction of the Transit of Venus Commission: Provided, That said commission shall deliver all the instruments and other public property in their possession into the custody of the Secretary of the Navy, $3,000."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is an item for this purpose in the legislative appropriation bill, and I ask the gentleman if he has examined it?

Mr. HERBERT. I have not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope this may be passed over until an opportunity for examination can be had. I think the appropriation is made in that bill.

Mr. HERBERT. Very well; I am willing to pass it over informally. I did not know that there was anything of the kind in the legislative bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that is covered by the legislative bill, and trust my friend from Kentucky will permit this to be passed until we can determine.

Mr. HERBERT. I want it to be passed over with the understanding that it goes into the bill unless it is contained in the other. The gentleman from Indiana will agree that it is to remain in this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, certainly. It can be stricken out, however, afterward if it is found to be a duplicate, as there is objection to passing it over.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraphs of the bill without any amendments being offered until line 174, under the heading "Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting" was reached.

Mr. WISE. I omitted to offer an amendment at the proper time. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to go back to offer an amendment at the end of line 125, under the heading "Bureau of Ordnance."

Mr. HERBERT. I object.

The Clerk read the paragraph appropriating for the naval asylum, Philadelphia, lines 208 to 236.

Mr. WHEELER addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HERBERT. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committ accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as the managers of the conference on the part of the House on the Army appropriation bill Mr. BRAGG of Wisconsin, Mr. VIELE of New York, and Mr. STEELE of Indiana.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER also announced the following as the select committee to investigate the alleged violations of Rule XXXIV: Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, Mr. MCRAE of Arkansas, Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio, Mr. GUENTHER of Wisconsin, and Mr. LYMAN of Iowa.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5886) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; and

A bill (H. R. 6391) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House is in recess until 8 o'clock this evening, when it reassembles for the consideration of pension and other bills under the special order.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

The Clerk read the following letter:

SIR: Hon. C. C. MATSON is designated to preside at the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, Jr.,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MATSON accordingly took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. WINANS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order. The Clerk will report the first bill.

WILLIAM J. OWINGS.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4097) for the relief of William J. Owings.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed over informally.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I now ask that members present may be allowed to call up such bills as they desire to have considered.

Mr. BRADY. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Perhaps the gentleman will allow me to make another request for unanimous consent, namely, that the bills be read by title in their order, but that when a bill is reached and no member rises to address the Chair, that bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SECTIONS 4756 AND 4757 REVISED STATUTES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4702) amending sections 4756 and 4757 Revised Statutes, relating to pensions to certain disabled persons who have served in the Navy or Marine Corps.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, that bill seems to be of a general character and I ask that it be passed over.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARGARET HUNTER HARDIE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1133) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Hunter Hardie.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension of Margaret Hunter Hardie, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. James A. Hardie, formerly Inspector-General of the Army, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $50 per month.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I would ask what is the present rate of pension which this lady receives?

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the report be read, and I hope that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] will be kind enough to give his attention.

Mr. PRICE. I certainly will listen when I have asked for information.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, as regards the officer for the benefit of whose widow this bill is reported I wish to say that I saw him here during the war, in 1862, just before I was elected to Congress, and witnessed his efforts in the service of the Government. He was the great assistant of Edwin M. Stanton, the organizing mind, as I think the Carnot of the war, and if there was a man who rendered great service to our side in that struggle it was the husband of the lady who is seeking relief here, and who is in great need.

The report (by Mr. SCOTT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1133) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Hunter Hardie, have had the same under consideration, and report:

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, and have agreed to the adoption of the report prepared and submitted by the Committee on Pensions of the Senate. (See Senate Report No. 252, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

The following is the Senate report:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1133) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Hunter Hardie, respectfully report:

The committee have only considered this bill, and desire to preface their report upon the same with the petition of the claimant, making it a part thereof, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The petition of Margaret Hunter Hardie, a citizen of the United States and resident of the District of Columbia, respectfully shows that she is the daughter of the late Henry D. Hunter, for many years an officer of merit in the Navy; the niece of the late Col. Richard B. Mason, of the Dragoons, who commanded in California during the Mexican war, and the widow of the late James Allen Hardie, an inspector-general in the Army.

That since the death of her husband, December 13, 1876, she has been in receipt of the monthly pension of $30 granted by the general law, and now prays an increase to $50 per month, because of her increasing age and infirmity and the gradual exhaustion of the slender means left to her at the time of her husband's death.

In support of her petition she refers to the long and important services of her husband as an Army officer, extending from the year 1843 to 1876, and including such duties and services as the following:

Assistant professor at the Military Academy 1844 to 1846. Commandant and civil administrator of the district of San Francisco during the Mexican war. Adjutant-general, Department of Oregon, 1860. Assistant adjutant-general, and afterward judge-advocate-general, headquarters Army of the Potomac, 1861 to 1863. Inspector-general in charge of the Inspector-General's Bureau at Washington, 1864 to 1865; also at the same time chief of the military staff of the Secretary of War. Senior officer of board of inspection of forts and arsenals 1866 to 1867. Special agent for investigation of war claims of Massachusetts and Kansas, and Indian war claims in Montana and Dakota, and the "Modoc" war claims 1867 to 1874. President of the special claims commission in the War Department 1867 to 1869. Special agent War Department attached to Indian commission of 1867. Inspector-general Military Division of the Missouri 1869 to 1872. Special agent for distribution of Government relief after the great fire at Chicago 1871. Inspector-general in the War Department and at headquarters of the Army 1872 to 1876.

The petitioner says that her late husband held the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers, and of colonel, brevet brigadier-general, and brevet major-general in the regular Army, and that he was engaged in the Mexican war, the Indian war in Washington Territory in 1858, and the civil war, until called to the War Department in 1863, and that for twenty months he was the actual chief of the Inspector-General's Bureau, and acted as Secretary of War, by appointment of the late President Lincoln, during an absence of Mr. Secretary Stanton in the fall of 1863.

The petitioner appends as an exhibit to this petition a copy of a memoir of her late husband, imprinted at Washington, 1877, and refers especially to pages 32, 33, 55, and 56, thereof, whereon are printed testimonials to his character and services from Generals Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Hancock, McClellan, Burnside, Hooker, Reynolds, Humphreys, Franklin, Wool, and others.

The petitioner says that she has two young daughters dependent upon her for support.

MARGARET HUNTER HARDIE.

Witnesses:
JOSH HARDIE.
CHAS. F. BENJAMIN.

General Hardie was a distinguished officer of the Army, having gone through all grades of the service up to that of brigadier-general and brevet major-general. Similar pensions have been granted to widows of officers of his rank, and the committee recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I want to make one more appeal to the House on this bill, to stop this vicious, because unjust, system of legislation. I have no argument to make that you are not all familiar with, but there is not a man in this House who does not know that, whatever may have been the distinguished services of the distinguished gentleman who was the husband of this widow, there were thousands of others, equally meritorious, whose widows to-day are getting nothing. Now, will you continue this unjust system always? If you do I can not help it, except by the adoption of means to which I am unwilling to resort—calling a quorum, using the one-man power. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. RANDALL. I have great respect for the gentleman's opinions, but when he says that this is unjust, I only claim the right to hold a different opinion. I move that the bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES J. ESTY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 810) granting a pension to Charles J. Esty.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the consideration of this bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles J. Esty, late a private in Company H, Tenth New Hampshire Volunteers.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ABBY L. BURBANK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2192) granting a pension to Abby L. Burbank.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the consideration of this bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Abby L. Burbank, widow of Charles H. Burbank, late a surgeon in the United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of forty dollars per month, in lieu of the amount she is now receiving.

Mr. MATSON. I ask for the reading of the report in this case.

The report (by Mr. BRADY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2192) granting an increase of pension to Abby L. Burbank, respectfully submit the following report:

Your committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2192) granting an increase of pension to Abby L. Burbank, have examined the same, adopt the Senate report, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The following is the report, by Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, made April 20, 1886, Senate Report No. 665, namely:

The petitioner, Abby L. Burbank, is the widow of Charles H. Burbank, late a surgeon (ranking with lieutenant) in the United States Navy. He enlisted May 9, 1861, and died in the service January 30, 1885, at Portsmouth, N. H. The widow was granted a pension upon her application by the Department under the general law, at the rate of $25, commencing February 18, 1885. She now asks that this amount be increased for the reasons set forth in her petition, which is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

On the 16th of April, 1885, the Pension Bureau issued in my (Abby L. Burbank's) favor a pension certificate No. 3261, entitling me to a pension of $25 per month as the widow of Charles H. Burbank, medical inspector, United States Navy, who died on January 30, 1885, of heart disease, induced by malaria, contracted at different periods in the service.

I do not consider the pension granted me is sufficient, and I would ask for an increase on the following grounds, namely:

Firstly, that the pension should have been commensurate with the rank which Dr. Burbank held when he first seriously contracted malaria, which was in 1871, while attached to the U. S. S. Michigan, on the lakes, when he held the rank of surgeon, which rank entitles to $30 per month. Also at a later date he was exposed to malaria and was very sick while on the North Atlantic squadron; and later still during his last cruise, while attached to the Brooklyn, on the South American coast, and on the west coast of Africa, when he was of the rank of medical inspector.

Dr. Burbank has suffered very much from this cause, especially through the latter part of his service, but through much distress and suffering held steadfastly to his duties; never more steadfastly or with greater effort than during his last cruise, which lasted more than three years, and from which he returned a broken-down man, and lived but three months after his return.

Secondly, I would ask for an increase of pension on the ground of his war record.

Dr. Burbank was on the Hartford under Admiral Farragut at the taking of New Orleans, and performed efficient service there; also at Pilot Town Hospital, Southwest Pass, Mississippi River, in 1862, where, owing to all the other surgeons dying, he was left in sole charge, when his duties became so arduous, and his responsibility became so great, that his health for a time was greatly impaired. He was also on the blockade, and was in active service all through the war.

Finally, I would ask for a larger pension on the ground of insufficient support. I am left in delicate health, with five children, all of whom are minors but one, and with means so limited that it is impossible to live upon it. In consideration of all these conditions, I would most earnestly appeal for a pension of $50 per month to enable me to provide for my family, which now I am unable to do.

ABBY L. BURBANK.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H., December 3, 1885.

Your committee, having verified the accuracy of the above petition, adopt the statements of fact set forth therein, and report back the petition with an original bill increasing the pension of the widow of this brave officer to $40 per month, and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I feel obliged to object to the passage of this bill. This officer was a surgeon; and as such he performed only a quasi military service. It is not alleged that he ever underwent any of the dangers of battle. Perhaps he may have been subjected to the dangers of service upon the sea, but so far as appears he encountered none of the perils of battle.

Mr. BRADY. A naval officer on board a war vessel is subjected of course to the dangers of battle.

Mr. MATSON. Very often there are hospital ships on which surgeons do duty.

Mr. BRADY. It does not appear from the record in this case that that was the fact here.

Mr. MATSON. I supposed it did. But, sir, I do not wish to cast any reflection on this officer. I am willing to allow him credit for everything stated in the report. Still the fact remains that he was a surgeon; and the proposition now is to select his widow from among hundreds of thousands of widows and increase her pension from $25 to $40 a month. It is a bad precedent. It may have been done before; but these things ought not to be done.

It certainly is manifestly wrong to single out one case in this way without any strong reason, and there is not a strong reason in this case. The fact that this surgeon contracted malaria, the fact that he lingered with the disease and subsequently died, does not distinguish the case of his widow from the cases of hundreds of thousands of other widows whose husbands died in the service. That is all there is in that part of the case.

The fact that this lady has five children who are minors only puts her upon a level with the numerous other widows of the country who have minor children. For each child under sixteen years of age she is entitled to a pension of $2 a month until the child reaches the age of sixteen, so that if all five of her children are under that age, she now draws a pension of $35 a month—$25 for herself and $2 for each of her children.

A MEMBER. The report states that four of her children are minors.

Mr. MATSON. Then she is drawing $33 a month. She says she wants the Government to support her. There is the bare proposition. Has this Government undertaken to give a full support to the widow of every man who died in the service? It has not done it and it can not do it. If it did we should have to grade pensions very differently, for some women with four children can live upon $35 a month and others can not.

Mr. PRICE. I indorse the gentleman's reasoning as applicable to this case; but I would like to have him tell me by what process he arrives at the conclusion that this bill is objectionable, when the one under consideration a few minutes ago to raise a pension from $25 to $50 a month was not to the gentleman objectionable.

Mr. MATSON. I object to that, too.

Mr. PRICE. Well, you did not object to it.

Mr. MATSON. I thought that you would talk in the one case and I would talk in the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. But you did not vote with me.

Mr. MATSON. I did not think it necessary when you were the only man voting.

Mr. PRICE. If you had voted with me there would have been two of us.

Mr. MATSON. I have voted with you time and again. I have never favored these increases of pension for any rank; but I do not know that it is necessary for me to repeat what has been said so often. The fact is that Congress began a great many years ago to increase the pensions of the widows of general officers until it has become almost an established thing, so that it is almost useless to resist in such cases, because the House passes them over our heads. We made a test case here several weeks ago. The case was about as weak as any that could be found; but we were beaten in a full House. What is the use of kicking against a thing that is well established? But this thing of granting increased pensions to widows of officers below the rank of general officers is not a fixed precedent by any means. There are some such cases, but they are very "few and far between." It is not right, I insist, Mr. Chairman, that bills of this character should pass.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that this case is considerably stronger in merit than the opposition which the gentleman from Indiana has presented to it. It has peculiar merits, if gentlemen will consider for a moment, and I will briefly call their attention to them.

Dr. Burbank was in the service of the country for a period of twenty-four years, and the record shows that he was a very efficient, faithful officer. It shows that he at one time, when every other surgeon had died while in a very unhealthy part of the country, unquestionably remained at this post day and night and attended the sick men at a time when he himself was far from well and his health very much injured, but he continued faithful to his duty on that occasion where it needed quite as much heroism for a man to stand as it ever does in line of battle.

The record further shows that although Dr. Burbank was a sick man for many years he did not flinch from performing his duty to its fullest extent. The record shows that he went to the southern coast of this country and the coast of Africa, into the malarial districts of this and foreign countries, performing his duty resolutely and honorably without reference to his own comfort and health. After twenty-four years of service, which I am satisfied was service of extraordinary fidelity, Dr. Burbank died; and for some reason, I confess I do not know why, his wife was given but $25 a month pension, while if he had been ranked as a major, as a surgeon with that rank, she would have received $50 a month.

Mr. MORRILL. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the pension of the rank of major is only $25 a month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I stand corrected; I was told differently. This man was very efficient and faithful in the discharge of his duties, and his widow is certainly deserving of some consideration. She was pensioned, and she comes here now and asks an increase, not because she has to rear five children, because that is a reason which is given in many such cases and is a strong reason to some extent, being in the nature of an appeal for sympathy in her behalf; but it is true, as I have it from the best men of both political parties that she is in very delicate health and it is a terrible struggle for her to support her children and maintain herself.

But the principal strength of her claim is because her husband had performed extraordinary services to the Government for nearly a quarter of a century, faithfully caring for those around him. For twelve or fifteen years, broken in health, carrying this disease with him, he performed these duties and died leaving this dependent family. I think it is a meritorious case, and there are precedents for the case. I believe it is as strong a case as that which has just now been passed, and I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin admits that. I feel that we ought not to discriminate against the widow in this case who asks this small amount at the hands of the Government when other widows in similar cases have received their pensions.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take up the time of the committee in discussing this question, or any other case that comes before the committee at these night sessions. I desire specially though very briefly to call the attention of the committee to a fact which has much influence with me, and that is that the Committee on Pensions of the Senate and the Senate itself have passed this bill; the Committee on Pensions of the House have considered it and reported it favorably to the House. I think it is a case meritorious in every respect. There are a number of precedents that might be cited, not as strong even as this, and I trust the report of the committee will be sustained and the bill passed.

Mr. PRICE. If the gentleman from Virginia can show me a case that he has ever found that is not meritorious, I will agree that his indorsement is worth something.

Mr. BRADY. Unfortunately, the gentleman from Wisconsin never knows a meritorious case from any other in this House, not only as to pensions but as to all other cases.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over to a full House.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not agree to that without giving notice of entering a motion to reconsider the case we have just passed. If one goes over, let both go.

Mr. MORRILL. That is a very different case. This is establishing a new precedent.

Mr. BRADY. I object to its going over. This is pension evening; we have assembled here for the purpose of transacting this business; cases of this kind have gone to the House from this committee and been sustained, and I think the committee is fully competent to deal with this question.

Mr. MORRILL. My request is that the bill be reported back to the House with the understanding that a vote be taken in a full House. I do it out of consideration for the gentleman who is pressing the case.

I wish it to be understood, though, that this is in my opinion a dangerous precedent to pass here. I feel that there is hardly a widow in the land whose husband fell upon the battlefield who could not come and urge stronger reasons than are urged in this case. I believe we shall be flooded with bills if we begin this species of legislation. There are a hundred thousand such cases in this land which will come to Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they served as long and faithfully they ought to have relief.

Mr. BRADY. How many served twenty-four years?

Mr. MORRILL. Of those twenty-four years twenty were in time of peace with a good salary, and he could have resigned at any time he pleased. It was a fair salary, and in fact that is rather against the case than for it. I simply ask that it go over to a full House.

Mr. GALLINGER. If you consider the fact that he was in the service twenty-four years, and there were fifteen when he was almost unfitted for duty though he stuck faithfully to his post it is not against the claim. For all that period of fifteen years he was in very bad health, but he still stood at his post.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not understand the report to say anything of that kind.

Another thing, this is almost in the nature of a positive direction to the Committee on Invalid Pensions to allow cases of this kind. In the Committee on Invalid Pensions we have stood there, the chairman and several other members, opposing bills of this kind on principle; but now if a precedent is to be established it ought to be done by a full House and when a quorum is present.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, on this question I desire to say one thing to my distinguished, highly esteemed, genial, but somewhat erratic friend from Virginia on my left here, who made a statement that I am unwilling shall go into the RECORD uncontradicted.

The gentleman says I have never discovered anything meritorious in any of these bills.

Mr. BRADY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not think I said that.

Mr. PRICE. That was the gentleman's language. I want to place myself right in regard to that. My theory is, I would pay to the widow of every soldier who sacrificed life and fortune in the defense of this Government to the extent of its revenues if necessary. But I have opposed all these propositions to take those who have a pension already and give them more while others are getting nothing. And I particularly object to giving a man or a woman or a dependent more because the husband was an officer.

I think the gentleman from Virginia does not misunderstand me and I hope he will not repeat it again—although I am not sure he will not. [Laughter.] Every one here with any intellect knows, and it does not require much talent to understand it, that my opposition is purely and solely to these distinctions made upon rank and position. In my opinion they are unrepublican; and I have opposed them to the extent of one vote in all cases.

If the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions had been consistent with his own dictates of what is right, he would at least have given me one more vote against the proposition to select for a higher pension this lady whose case was brought up under the auspices of my able, distinguished, and genial friend from Pennsylvania, who on every occasion that I have known him to come here has always had some one of this class of cases to take up; the case of some officer's widow who is now receiving a pension and to give her more. I know the gentleman is conscientious. I can not agree with him. My judgment does not run in the same line. Therefore my misfortune has been that I have found it necessary to call the attention of the House to this system of legislation, which I believe to be vicious and unjust, in order that it may be put a stop to.

Mr. BRADY. I concede to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he is the champion of the private soldier as against the officer.

Mr. PRICE. Equal rights for all is what I want.

Mr. BRADY. The gentleman has always appeared here as the advocate of the poor private. I happened to be in the war, a private as well as an officer. I have friendship and sympathy for both and believe in doing justice to each.

Mr. PRICE. Justice to each alike.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from Wisconsin has arraigned me. What he stated he stated without thinking. He said I advocated the increase of pensions of officers.

Mr. PRICE. I was not referring to the gentleman from Indiana. I mean my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. Do not make a mistake there.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not, like some other gentlemen, want to fight the battle over again. The case which has been referred to is decided, and that is the end of it. We are all happy and brethren again.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to say just one word in reference to this case. If we are to act upon this report at the present time I hope this bill will not pass. I do so because I feel, and I feel it somewhat strongly, too, that if there is any danger to-day that impends over our pension system it is the piling up of these big pensions that are out of proportion to the whole pension system.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why did you not object to the case last passed?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I was not in; I got in just as it was being voted on.

Now, if any good reason can be shown why this widow should be taken out of the great number of widows to whom our law grants pensions and a higher pension given to her, then I certainly will vote for it. But I have listened attentively to all that has been said, and I see absolutely nothing that applies to this particular widow that will not apply to every one that is pensionable under the law.

Mr. BRADY. Did the gentleman hear the report read?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I heard the report read in full, except, perhaps, the first few words. In the first place it appears this man was a surgeon, a non-combatant——

Mr. BRADY. He was in the Navy.

Mr. CUTCHEON. A non-combatant, not required to bear arms. It appears in the next place that he served for twenty-four years. As the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] said, during those twenty-four years he drew a good salary. It was his privilege at any time to retire from the service if he chose and take a pension; but he preferred the full pay and duty. In the next place it is said he was sick for fifteen years. If he was sick, he got his full pay all the time, sick or well.

Then it is said that finally he died. I take it every widow's husband dies, and I take it one of them is about as dead as another. I see no reason in that. It is said this widow has a family. Why, you can go to your widows' pension-list and pick out thousands who have larger families than this lady and less pension. Many have no pension at all.

I can see no reason in anything that is alleged here why this pension ought to be increased. Feeling that way, I shall give my individual vote against it. I shall not make any factious opposition. I shall not raise the point of a quorum. I end as I began. If there is any one thing that is to-day threatening our pension system it is this piling up of large pensions, burdening the Treasury, and producing a certain degree of demoralization among our entire pensionable class.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, I never have said anything in this committee or in this House, but I do not like the tenor of some of the remarks that have been made here to night. When we are considering the case of a brave officer, a surgeon in the Navy, exposed to all the dangers and perils of battle as much as the man who walks the quarter-deck, and when it is said that he might have resigned, I think that is a remark which ought not to be made.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If the gentleman alludes to me, I will say, if he will permit me, that my remark applied to this officer's sickness. It was stated that he stood at his post although he was sick, and I remarked that if he was sick it was his privilege to resign, but that he preferred to remain on duty and draw his full pay.

Mr. SAWYER. Of course it is the privilege of any officer to resign.

A MEMBER. Or of a member of Congress, either.

Mr. SAWYER. Certainly. Again, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the pittance that is voted by the action of Congress to any soldier or his widow has been, or is likely to be, so large as to create dissatisfaction on the part of the people generally with the pension system. A bill is now pending the effect of which will be to distribute among comparatively a few men over $200,000,000 for arrears, and our side of the House is supposed to be in favor of it.

Now, you may take all the pensions that have been granted by act of Congress since the system of granting pensions began, and supposing the system to continue for a quarter of a century longer, increasing as rapidly as it has increased for two years, yet it will not make so great a drain upon the Treasury as that arrears act which we Republicans claim to be in favor of. I do not believe that there are two thousand people to-day upon the pension-rolls of the United States that have been placed there by act of Congress, and whenever the question comes before us of acknowledging the value of the services of the men who, with their lives in their hands, exposed themselves to the dangers of hospital, and camp, and battlefield, it does not look well in my judgment for us, especially for us Republicans, to be always talking about the fear that if we act liberally we shall endanger the pension system in the affections of the people.

I tell you, gentlemen, that there is nothing that Congress does or can do which so commends itself to the mass of the people, North and South alike, as making liberal provision for those men who endured the hardships and dangers of the war in the service of their country.

Mr. PRICE. It should be done equally, though.

Mr. SAWYER. Equally! I do not propose to discuss that question. In my judgment there should be a difference, but I do not propose to argue the question now. I merely wish to enter my dissent from the idea that there is danger that Congress by its liberality to those who are entitled to pensions will disturb the confidence of the people in the pension system.

So far as this particular case is concerned, I feel this way: This man as a surgeon in the service of his country endured as much exposure and subjected himself to as great peril when he was upon the coast of Africa, or in New Orleans, or at any of the posts along our southern coast where yellow-fever was raging as any man incurs upon the battlefield, and when we have the case of a man who stands at his post unflinchingly and serves his country for twenty-four years it is no more than just that his service should be acknowledged, and when application is made on behalf of the widow who stood by him in the hour of danger, caring for their children, I say it is no more than right that she should be protected and her children cared for.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And, Mr. Chairman, I would add to that that this widow is now getting precisely the same pension that she would get if her husband had been a major in the Army and had fallen in battle at Petersburg or the Wilderness torn by shot or shell.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to detain the committee, but I wish to say a word. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] is always consistent about these pension cases. He believes in pensioning the widow of the major-general at the same rate that he would pension the widow of a private soldier.

Mr. PRICE. That is it. You quote me correctly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is an extraordinary position; and the gentleman from Wisconsin has a patent on it and nobody is trying to take it away from him. Nature made a difference, and the law makes a difference, and this Congress is not going to undertake to undo what nature and the law have done in that regard.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] takes strong ground against this case from a little different standpoint. I will not stop to answer all his objections. I will simply say that if this man had been in the Army and had shown the same bravery and fidelity that he showed as a surgeon, the probability is that he would not have stopped at the rank of major. As it was, he reached the highest rank that he could reach under the circumstances in which he was placed, and if he had been in the Army it is quite likely that we might have been asked here to-night to pension the widow of a brigadier-general instead of the widow of a major.

History proves that there is no post so dangerous as that of a surgeon on the coast of Africa, or on our own southern coast during the prevalence of the terrible epidemics that sometimes prevail, and the record in this case shows that this man stood to his post when every other surgeon was dead, and faithfully discharged his duty to the men who were under his care.

If this House wishes to vote a pension of $50 a month in the case they have just passed upon and refuse to pension this widow at the rate of $40 a month, I have only to say that they are more inconsistent than I believe they are going to be. I ask for a vote.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and there were—ayes 23, noes 13.

So the motion was agreed to.

HENRY BELLION.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1217) for the relief of Henry Bellion.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of demand for the consideration of this bill it will be passed over.

WILLIAM LYNCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6132) granting a pension to William Lynch.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the consideration of this bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William Lynch, late a private in Company E, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. WINANS. I would like to hear the report read in this case.

The report (by Mr. STRUBLE) was read, as follows:

William Lynch enlisted as sergeant in Company E, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry, March 8, 1849, for five years; re-enlisted September 8, 1854, and was honorably discharged September 8, 1859. He alleges that while serving in line of duty in Utah Territory, in the winter of 1857-'58, and owing to exposure from continued sleeping upon the ground, he incurred a disability of right leg and right hip, which soon resulted in a shortening of that leg, accompanied by severe pains, which disabilities have continued to this time. Claimant at that time, and at time of filing his original declaration for pension, supposed that the disability incurred as above stated was rheumatism, and so averred. He did not place himself under the treatment of an Army surgeon, nor is there an official record of his disability.

Pierce Tobin testifies that he enlisted in said Company E, in Utah, in the summer of 1858; that he was drilled by Sergt. William Lynch, who was lame and complained of lameness and rheumatic pains contracted during the previous winter while lying on the frozen ground. The credibility of Tobin is certified to by the officer before whom he made his affidavit.

Patrick Larkin and Thomas Burke testify to having been neighbors and fellow-laborers with claimant from 1859 to 1870; and that he was suffering with some disability which he called rheumatism or inflammation of hip-joint; and that claimant was able to do only one-fourth the work of an able-bodied man. Claimant was examined April 30, 1884, by board of surgeons at Kansas City, who failed to find any disability. June 17, 1884, he was examined by Dr. D. P. Porter, of Kansas City, who found chronic inflammation and enlargement of said hip-joint and a shortening of 1 inch in said right leg. He estimated claimant's disability as total.

December 16, 1885, claimant was examined by board of surgeons at Leavenworth, who found, substantially, the same evidences of disability as discovered by Dr. Porter, and rated claimant at fifteen-eighteenths of total disability.

Your committee therefore report the bill favorably, and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT K. BENNETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7698) granting a pension to Robert K. Bennett.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the consideration of this bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert K. Bennett, late of Company H, One hundred and fifty-sixth New York Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANTHONY M'ROBERTSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7327) granting a pension to Anthony McRobertson.

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. MORRILL asked for the consideration of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anthony McRobertson, late a private in the Seventy-second Regiment of Missouri Enrolled Militia.

Mr. WALLACE. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

Claimant was a private in Company B, Seventy-second Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia, and claimed a pension for gunshot wound of the right jaw-bone; also gunshot wound through the back, received in action in Stone County, Missouri. His claim was rejected because not within provisions of pension laws.

Capt. Henry Sullivan, of Company K, Forty-sixth Missouri Volunteers, who was in command of a squad of men from his own company and claimant's company, and Lieut. D. S. Pearce, of claimant's company, both testify to the terrible manner in which claimant was shot. Captain Sullivan says he was within 20 steps of him when he was shot, and says that claimant "was shot through the body; the ball entered the breast, passed through the body, and lodged in the skin in the back. The second shot struck him in the left jaw, knocked out his teeth on both sides, cutting his tongue nearly in two, and passed out at the right cheek. The rebel who shot him was within 6 feet of McRobertson when he was shot, the powder burning his face."

Dr. L. L. Frazier testifies that he was called to attend claimant the same day of his injury, and found—

"That he was wounded by a ball passing through his left jaw, knocking out several teeth, and striking the inside of the right jaw, and passing downward out of reach, causing quite an impediment in his speech; that afterward several pieces of bone came from his jaw-bone, causing a stiffness in his jaws, operating against him in opening his mouth, and necessarily causing a permanent impediment in his speech. Another ball entered his back, under the left shoulder-blade, passing through his chest, and lodging against the skin, from whence I cut said ball. His condition was certainly a very critical one, and one at the time that I thought was beyond recovery."

The evidence shows that the men were under the command of General Sanborn, district commander.

Your committee are unable to see why the case was rejected, as the evidence in the case was filed prior to July 4, 1874, and therefore report favorably, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY H. STUTSMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1224) granting a pension to Henry Stutsman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry H. Stutsman, late a private in Company F, Thirteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. PERKINS. There is an adverse report in this case.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY ROSCOE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6523) granting a pension to Henry Roscoe.

Mr. WINANS. I ask for the consideration of this bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Henry Roscoe, late first lieutenant of Company C, Fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-roll, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 4, the words "place the name" and insert "increase the pension."

In line 6, strike out the words "on the pension-roll."

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask for the reading of the report in this case.

The report (by Mr. PINDAR) was read, as follows:

Claimant is now receiving a pension of $17 per month for double inguinal hernia, received in service in the late war as first lieutenant of Company C, Fourth Regiment New York Volunteers. He filed application for increase, which was rejected upon the ground that he is now receiving the full amount of pension to which he is entitled for double hernia.

The examination on his application for increase to $24 per month discloses the following facts:

"We find on right side an oblique inguinal hernia, descending into the scrotum, about the size of a man's fist. It is easily reduced while he is standing, and the ring is so large and patulous that it is evidently extremely difficult if not impossible to keep the hernia up with a truss. On left side we find a very small inguinal hernia, filling the abdominal ring and giving an impulse on coughing. This hernia protrudes very slightly through the ring and evidently could be easily retained by a well-fitting truss.

"Piles.—We find seven small external around anus, and, on straining, three internal piles are brought into view, each about the size of a small strawberry, all somewhat inflamed. Tongue not coated, rather pale skin, anemic in look, no enlargement of liver or spleen.

"Diarrhea.—No evidence of diarrhea, except his statement. If the claimant was a private we should rate him twelve-eighteenths, third grade, for double hernia. We should also rate his piles at three-fourths total, if that disability appeared on his order for examination."

Dr. George H. Marmion testifies as follows:

"Am a citizen of Elizabeth County, Virginia; aged forty-three years [and well known to be a reputable physician of good standing and entitled to credit]; am a physician of nineteen years' standing; my post-office is Hampton, Va. I have carefully examined Henry Roscoe in relation to his disability and find him suffering under the following disabilities: Double inguinal hernia, reducible, but can not be retained by a truss; hernial tumor as large as a cocoanut at present; he suffers also with chronic diarrhea, and states he has suffered thus since 1863. There is a large mass of hemorrhoids protruding from the anus on all sides of the sphincter, each of which is as large as an almond and the orifice surrounded with——"

Said Roscoe states that he had a paralytic stroke December, 1880, and lost use of right arm and left leg and right side of the face, which he has only partially recovered.

The constant attacks of diarrhea are clearly traceable to the hernia and keep him in a condition incapacitating him entirely from the performance of manual labor. The piles and chronic diarrhea can be clearly traced as results of the causes producing the original rupture.

The condition of this soldier is such, in the opinion of your committee, as to entitle him to the relief sought, and we therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "to place the name," in line 4, and insert "to increase the pension," and strike out the words "on the pension-roll," in line 6, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARY M. GILLHAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8374) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary M. Gillham.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the consideration of this bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary M. Gillham, widow of James G. Gillham, late a private in Company I, Seventeenth Regiment of Iowa Infantry Volunteers.

Mr. WALLACE. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

Mrs. Gillham is the widow of James G. Gillham, late a private in Company I, Seventeenth Iowa Volunteers, who died April 20, 1885.

At the time of soldier's death he was drawing a pension of $8 for right inguinal hernia, from which he had been a constant sufferer since his discharge.

Mrs. Gillham filed application for pension June 16, 1885, which was rejected for the reason "that cause of soldier's death not shown to have resulted from his service." This rejection is based on the certificate of Dr. R. A. Patchin, who was his attending physician in his last illness, and who certifies that the immediate cause of death was "cirhosis of the liver."

Mrs. Louisa Wallace, a professional nurse, testifies:

"She was present with James G. Gillham in his last sickness, and waited on him for several days; that he was suffering with hernia of a very extraordinary character, which was attended with cramps, and his whole system was more or less affected, thereby being reduced to a mere skeleton, and during the last week of his sickness was complicated with liver trouble, the combined effects of which produced his death. The physician treated him for liver trouble; the whole right side was so tender he could not bear the weight of his clothing."

Dr. J. F. Kennedy, secretary of the State board of health of Iowa, says:

"When I was a member of the pension examining board of this city, Mr. Gillham, husband of Mary M. Gillham, came before me two or three times relative to his physical condition, and I tried to procure him a Government trusts, which was refused, as he was not a pensioner, but only an applicant. I believe his death was indirectly attributable to his hernia."

It is in evidence that said Gillham was confined to his room and bed much of the time during the last year of his life, suffering great pain from his rupture, and it would seem to be a reasonable presumption that this disability was the indirect cause of his death. At any rate, he received an injury while serving his country that disabled him and made him a sufferer during all the remainder of his life, prevented him from obtaining a competence for his family, and his wife is now left alone and destitute. The Government should in part compensate her for this loss.

Your committee believe her justly entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WARREN L. RICE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7517) for the relief of Warren L. Rice.

Mr. O'HARA. I call for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Warren L. Rice, late a private in Company F, Sixth Michigan Heavy Artillery, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. WALLACE. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) was read, as follows:

Warren L. Rice enlisted as a private in Company F, Sixth Michigan Heavy Artillery, February 5, 1864, and was discharged August 20, 1865; bases his claim for a pension on account of rheumatism contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty. Claim rejected because there is no record evidence showing condition in the service, and testimony filed is not considered sufficient to show that the alleged rheumatism was contracted in service. The record shows that soldier was absent sick in hospital at New Orleans while in the service; regimental hospital records not on file. Records of Surgeon-General's Office show soldier sick with diphtheria at post hospital.

Dr. Calvin F. Ashley, of Ypsilanti, Mich., testifies that he has known soldier since 1854; he was a hearty, healthy man prior to and at the time of his enlistment, free from rheumatism, sciatica, or any kindred disease.

Louis Merrill, private and acting sergeant of claimant's company, testifies that soldier while on guard duty was taken sick and fell insensible; was ordered to the hospital at New Orleans in consequence thereof. Affiant is corroborated in this testimony by Lorenzo Hoight, first sergeant of company.

Capt. Alonzo Shumway, of the same company, states:

"That en route from Fort Gaines, Ala., to New Orleans, La., claimant was prostrated with severe rheumatism. He continued to suffer for some time while in camp at Carrollton. He was not put on sick list. He had severe pain in back and hips, which I believe was caused by rheumatism; his face was much swollen, caused by neuralgia."

Dr. Ashley further testifies that soldier came home a physical wreck, and that he treated him from September, 1865, for rheumatism, and that his liver was exceedingly torpid, and he continued to treat him during the year 1866, during which time he was totally unable to perform manual labor.

Dr. Rosman, who treated claimant, is dead, but his widow testifies that claimant was treated by her husband for about two years, from 1867, for rheumatism and liver trouble. The medical examiner, in July, 1883, states that while there are no visible symptoms of rheumatism, he complains of weak back and symptoms which point to sciatica. His appearance is that of chronic dyspepsia and debility. Had he claimed for debility resulting from chronic dyspepsia, I should rate him a total, $8.

Two members of the board of surgeons, March, 1884, state there is a general athrophy of the muscular system, there is increased cardiac impulse, but no valvular disease. For muscular atrophy and consequent debility of the whole system we rate him one-fourth, third grade.

All the evidence tends to show that claimant entered the service of the United States a sound, healthy man; he came out a physical wreck, and has continued to suffer from its effect. Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL BULMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8977) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Samuel Bulman.

Mr. WEBER. I call for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Samuel Bulman, late a private in Company M, First Regiment New York Volunteer Artillery, as dependent father of Dewitt C. Bulman, late a private in Company B, Twenty-eighth New York Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

VIRGINIA TAYLOR RANDALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7712) granting a pension to Virginia Taylor Randall.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Virginia Taylor Randall, widow of Lieut. Col. Burton Randall, late a surgeon in the United States Army, and that she be paid a pension of $25 per month.

Mr. MATSON. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. WHEELER. The committee that reported this bill ask to substitute the report which I hold in my hand, which is simply the original report with certain documents stricken out to make it briefer.

The report (by Mr. WOLFORD) was read, as follows:

The committee find that Colonel Randall was appointed in the regular Army of the United States fifty-four years ago; that he served with credit and distinction for a period of thirty-six years; they also find that during the late war he was brevetted for faithful and meritorious service. The committee find that he served in the campaign against the Seminole Indians in Florida, and in the army of occupation and invasion in the war with Mexico. They find that in the Florida war he contracted disease from which he never recovered. The committee here insert, as part of their report, the record of Colonel Randall furnished by the War Department:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 16, 1886.

Statement of the military service of Burton Randall, late of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office.

He was appointed assistant surgeon United States Army October 24, 1832; promoted surgeon July 7, 1838; retired October 17, 1868. He received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel March 13, 1865, "for faithful and meritorious services during the war." He was on duty at Fort Jackson, La., from October, 1832, to July, 1833; in the Indian Territory to December, 1833; in Louisiana to April 1836; in connection with emigrating Indians to August, 1836; at Washington, D. C., to October, 1838; at Philadelphia, Pa., to April, 1839; in the Florida war against the Seminole Indians to March, 1842; at Fort Pickens, Fla., to June, 1842; in Louisiana to April, 1843; in the Indian Territory to January, 1847; with the army of occupation and invasion in the war with Mexico, to July, 1848; at Fort Barrancas, Fla., to September, 1849; at Jackson barracks, La., to June, 1853; in the Indian Territory to August, 1857, and at Carlisle barracks, Pa., to September 26, 1861; on leave to October 26, 1861; in charge of the general hospital at Annapolis, Md., to July, 1862; on duty at Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, to March, 1866, and at Fort Trumbull, Conn. (on leave May 1 to June 30, 1867), to August 16, 1867; on sick leave to September 15, 1868; awaiting orders to October 17, 1868, upon which date he was retired from active service, being over sixty-two years of age, under act of July 17, 1862. On November 9, 1878, he was admitted to the Government Hospital for the Insane, in the District of Columbia, where he remained, under medical treatment, until he died, February 8, 1886.

J. C. KELTON,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

It appears from evidence before the committee that the widow of Colonel Randall, Mrs. Virginia Taylor Randall, a niece of Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States, is now sixty-seven years of age, and that she was married to Surgeon Randall in the year 1848.

The committee also append to and make a part of their report the statement of Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: I served with and was intimately acquainted with Col. Burton Randall during the winter of 1859 and 1860. I recall conversations in his family regarding his ill health, and that it was attributed to exposure in the service and the hardships incident thereto. At this time there was no "retired-list" and pension claims were not considered.

I regard the bill introduced by Mr. WILLIS, to grant a pension to Colonel Randall's widow, as very meritorious, and hope it will receive your favorable consideration. Mrs. Randall was, as you know, a Miss Virginia Taylor, of Kentucky, a niece of President Taylor.

With high regard, truly your friend,

JOSEPH WHEELER.

General FRANK L. WOLFORD,
House of Representatives.

The committee recommend that, in view of all the circumstances and the age of Mrs. Randall, the bill do pass.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend this bill by striking out at the end the words "and that she be paid a pension of $25 a month" and inserting after the word "pension-roll" the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to that amendment. In that form the bill will amount to exactly the same thing that it does now.

Mr. WINANS. The bill will be in better form if amended as proposed.

Mr. PRICE. It will look better on the record, and if it amounts to the same thing there can be no objection.

The amendment of Mr. PRICE was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. THOMAS.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask by unanimous consent to take up House bill 4688, to increase the pension of Mrs. Thomas, the widow of a gallant major who was killed by the Modoc Indians. It was reported originally by the committee of the House at $40 a month. In the House it was reduced to $30. The Senate have returned it with the pension restored to $40 a month. I desire to call it up to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I demand the regular order of business.

MARY B. HOOK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2095) granting an increase of pension to Mary B. Hook.

The CHAIRMAN. No member moving to consider the bill, it will be informally passed over.

MRS. THOMAS.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky is unable longer to remain in the House and I will withdraw my objection to taking up the bill (H. R. 4688) to increase the pension of Mrs. Thomas, but I give notice I shall insist on the regular order till 10 o'clock, when I will not object to members calling up bills by unanimous consent.

Mr. WOLFORD. The Senate amendment strikes out $30 a month and inserts $40, and I move it be concurred in.

Mr. MATSON. Let the bill be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk states that the bill is not on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MATSON. If the bill is not on the Calendar, it can not be considered.

Mr. WOLFORD. The committee have reported unanimously in favor of concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand the gentleman to state the bill has passed the Senate and that the question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MATSON. The Senate amendment puts back the pension to $40, which was cut down in the House to $30.

Mr. WOLFORD. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not object to taking up this bill.

Mr. MATSON. I do not make any point of order. I wish to accommodate my friend from Kentucky, but I would like to know whether the Chair is not bound to protect the committee in a matter of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask for the reading of the order under which the House is acting to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 p. m., at which evening session private bills granting pensions reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered. As amended.

The CHAIRMAN. While this bill has been reported heretofore——

Mr. WOLFORD. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It passed the House and was sent to the Senate, from which it was returned with an amendment, and then it was recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WOLFORD. From which concurrence in the Senate amendment is unanimously reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think it could not be considered under the special order which has been read.

Mr. NEECE. If I understand the reading of that order it does not require bills to be on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. They can not be on the Calendar unless they have been referred to the Committee of the Whole by the House.

Mr. WOLFORD. This bill was reported at $40 by the committee, but the Committee of the Whole House struck it down to $30. The Senate amendment restores the pension to $40. It was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and that committee directed me to report concurrence in the Senate amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has informed the Chair it is not upon the Calendar.

Mr. WOLFORD. It has been unanimously reported favorably.

The CHAIRMAN. When?

Mr. WOLFORD. At the last meeting of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. When was it reported to the House?

Mr. WOLFORD. I am directed to report it now.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not now in order. The gentleman can report it at the next meeting of the House, and that will cause only a delay of one week. This committee can not receive reports of committees. That is the province of the House. The bill is not before the committee.

RACHEL BARNES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9106) granting a pension to Rachel Barnes.

Mr. FULLER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Rachel Barnes, widow of William Barnes, who served in Company I, Second United States Infantry, from February 24, 1838, to and until February 24, 1841, and pay her such pension as her said husband, William Barnes, would have received had he been allowed a pension upon the claim filed by him July 3, 1880, and had the same continued until the date of his death, to wit, March 24, 1882: Provided, That said Rachel Barnes shall not be paid any pension after said last-named date, but upon payment of the pension herein provided for her name shall be dropped from said roll.

Mr. FULLER. I move to strike out all after the word "her," in line 9, and in lieu thereof to insert "a pension as such widow from and after the passage of this act, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. WALLACE. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. FULLER. It is quite lengthy, and, if necessary, it can be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not see how we are to vote intelligently unless these reports are read. If they are not read it turns over to a committee the whole legislation of the House.

Mr. FULLER. After I have made a brief statement, if it is not satisfactory the gentleman can then have the report read.

Mr. WALLACE. The report is read, as I understand it, in my time.

Mr. LONG. But the report is quite lengthy, and all the gentleman from Iowa asks is to make a statement of the case, after which, if the reading of the report is insisted upon, why of course that is the right of any gentleman.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not desire to appear captious, and have no objection to the gentleman making a statement.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, as I have a personal knowledge of many of the circumstances surrounding this case I feel it my duty to take a few minutes of the time of the Committee in stating what I know of this case, which to me is a very sad one.

William Barnes, the husband of Rachael Barnes, who is seeking a pension, was a soldier from February 24, 1838, to February 24, 1841, in Company I, Second United States Infantry. This was during the Florida war. During the winter of 1840–'41, while engaged in a lengthy scouting expedition in South Florida among the swamps and everglades of that region, sleeping on the ground, with no tents, he contracted partial blindness.

This partial blindness continued and gradually grew worse until he was entirely incapacitated from earning a livelihood. They had no surgeon with them and he was treated in camp by a steward. This soldier filed an application for pension July 3, 1880. As the incurrence of the disease of the eyes was more than forty-five years ago, it was difficult to find testimony. His comrades were dead. He proved the soundness of his eyes at date of enlistment and their unsoundness upon his return home after his discharge. He also showed by two affidavits of civilians, who saw him during service, that his eyes were affected while in the service. The Department rejected the claim January 14, 1881, for the reason that he had not shown origin to the satisfaction of the office.

There was only one chance remaining, and that was to find living comrades who could indentify him. I entered into a correspondence with the Department to ascertain if there was a living soldier who belonged to his company. After a long search it was ascertained that his lieutenant was still living—General M. R. Patrick, governor of the Soldiers' Home at Dayton, Ohio. Mr. Barnes had become very much discouraged. He had no money. He was strong, but he could not see to work. It seemed to him that the fates were against him, and for himself and wife, with whom he had lived for nearly fifty years, it was "over the hill to the poorhouse." When he learned that his old lieutenant, Patrick, was still living he brightened up. He began to hope and believe that he would receive his dues from the Government. His friends gave him money and he went to Dayton, Ohio, to see General Patrick.

I well remember his coming to see me on his return and his jubilant manner. He said his lieutenant remembered him and would send the necessary testimony. He said at first General Patrick did not recall him. They talked over the incidents of those years. The general got out his old trunk in which were the old army papers. The years were brought back. The battles of forty-five years ago were again talked over. He remembered William Barnes, the trouble with his eyes he recalled. The necessary link in the case was found. Days and weeks passed and nothing was heard from the Department or General Patrick. I noticed that Uncle Barnes was not so cheerful. He would ask me if I thought his old lieutenant would "go back on him," as he expressed it.

I met the old gentleman on the evening of March 23, 1882, on my way home from my office. He stopped me. I saw he was very much agitated and depressed. His manner was very peculiar and not at all natural. He abruptly said to me: "Mr. Fuller, you need not do anything more for me in that pension matter." I said to him I should, and that we could get the pension. He turned from me and leaned over the fence and commenced to weep, and said: "Let it go, my old lieutenant has 'gone back on me.' He thinks I am a fraud, and they (the Government) will do nothing for me." I endeavored to console him; told him that the Government was slow to act and that there was much red tape about Government offices, and said to him that in the morning I would write to the Pension Office and our Congressman; that I believed General Patrick had sent in the testimony, but the office was slow in acting upon the case. I could not console him. I never saw him again alive.

The next day, about 11 o'clock in the morning, my little boy found him hanging to a tree in my timber-lot, a short distance from my house. Uncle Barnes had given up; hope had died out; the poor-house was before him; the Government that he had served so well he thought had forsaken him; his last remaining comrade, his lieutenant, he believed had changed his opinion and thought him a fraud. It was too much. His mind gave way, and with the only thought that he must get away from this, to him, cruel world he took his life. If he had only waited a few days this feeling of gloom and utter despondency would have given way to joy. Let me here read Lieutenant Patrick's letter to the Commissioner of Pensions, February 16, 1882:

On or about the 7th of January, 1882, in reply to inquiries made in relation to one William Barnes, formerly of I Company, Second Regiment of Infantry, I wrote you giving some facts which I found in my journal. I had written him at about the same time very nearly a duplicate of what I wrote you. At his own expense he has come here to see me, bringing with him letters of the very best character. His presence here and a re-examination of my journal enable me to speak of him more in detail than before; and, at the risk of being somewhat prolix, I will state that in the summer of 1839 he, with his company, under command of Captain Russell, went into Florida and down the coast in the neighborhood of Key Biscayne and the mouth of the Miami River, where the captain was soon after killed and the company left in command of a young lieutenant recently appointed from civil life.

When I reached there, in December following, I found that the company was for quite a time without shelter, sleeping in the open air, suffering much from mosquitoes and the climate generally. A number of cases of moon-blindness existed when I took the company, some of the men being unable to perform night duty on that account.

I do not recollect anything in particular of this man Barnes, save that on several occasions I took him with me as a very trusty man. He had been a corporal almost from his enlistment, but, being without any education, felt himself incapable of discharging the duties, and so resigned.

On the 1st day of March following I find him one of the picked men who were sent out and were attaked by Indians, in which he behaved remarkably well, as he was reported to have done once before I took the company. Between that time and the 1st of July following I occasionally took him with me on hunting expeditions, I carrying a rifle and he a fowling-piece, because, as he stated, he could not see to shoot at any distance, as he could when he first came into Florida.

On examining my journal in his presence he has recalled to my recollection certain incidents, such as my signaling him to join me when he has been at some distance from me, and his being unable to see me until being told by those with him that I was signaling.

On one occasion in particular he was for a time very much troubled at a reprimand I gave him for not shooting at an object which I pointed out, until he again reminded me that he could see but a short distance. I find from a reference to my journal that on the 24th of July I placed him in charge of certain rough carpenter work in building a post, and in connection with the fall of a bent in a large building the question of his defective eyesight again came up.

From my knowledge of the man up to the time of his discharge in February, 1841, I feel very confident, amounting to almost certainty, that his disability commenced in the summer of 1839, while serving in the neighborhood of Key Biscayne, involving a large amount of boat-service among the keys, bays, Miami River, open-water everglades, and water service generally (the sun shining upon the water with great brilliancy), sleeping in open air at night during that summer, and that it became intensified by continuous service through the summer of 1840 in the sands of the Touhlacooche and Ochlawaha districts, when troops in that country were usually at rest. On this subject I speak from an experience of five years' continuous service in Florida.

In 1837, and again in 1842, I found myself laid up with brain-fever from these same causes.

I have asked Colonel Thomas (treasurer of the home), recognized as among the ablest of our medical men, to be present during my examination of the man and himself to examine him professionally with a view to giving his opinion in the case. Through other sources than the letter I have received I hear the very best character possible given him as to perfect truthfulness and honesty, and these accord with the record in my journal of the trusts with which he was honored when with me. I do not know whether this statement can be of any use in forwarding his claim, but so far as it goes I can swear to it.

Very respectfully,

M. R. PATRICK, Governor.

This letter containing such convincing evidence of the righteousness of William Barnes's claim came too late. I trust this House will vindicate his memory by granting a pension to his widow.

Rachel Barnes, widow of William Barnes, applied for a pension March 20, 1883. Her application was rejected under the technical rules of the Pension Office. Mrs. Barnes is not a young woman. She is between seventy and eighty years of age. She took the death of her husband very hard. She has no means of support. She should receive the pension which undoubtedly her husband would have received had he lived. No words of mine can add to the strength of the simple facts in this case. I believe it is only justice that Congress assist this widow, and I trust the pension asked will be granted.

Mr. CUTCHEON. By the bill no arrears are allowed?

Mr. FULLER. No, sir; it does not provide for arrears.

Mr. NEECE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after "1841," in line 8, and insert "and pay her a pension subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. O'HARA. The amendment already offered accomplishes what the gentleman from Illinois desires.

Mr. NEECE. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. FULLER] which is the longest, the report or his statement? If the report is longer, I withdraw my request for the reading of it.

The amendment offered by Mr. FULLER was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to take up out of its order the bill H. R. 5796.

Mr. MORRILL. I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to make a suggestion. I understand that General ANDERSON can not be here next Friday evening, and it would be an accommodation to him to have the bill he has indicated taken up now.

Mr. NEECE. I shall insist on the regular order till about 10 o'clock, and I shall then be willing that members shall call up bills out of their regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order being insisted upon, the Clerk will report the next bill.

MARGARET S. FAIN.

The next business called up for consideration (by Mr. SWOPE) was the bill (H. R. 260) for the relief of Margaret S. Fain.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret S. Fain, widow of William C. Fain, who was killed while recruiting a regiment about April 6, 1864, at Pitman's Ferry, Hope County, Tennessee.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

Add at the end of the bill the words "and pay her the pension allowed to the widow of a captain."

Mr. WALLACE. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 260) for the relief of Margaret S. Fain, report:

The evidence filed in this case shows that William C. Fain, the husband of the petitioner, Margaret Fain, was an attorney-at-law residing at Morgantown, Fannin County, Georgia; that in March, 1864, he left home to join the Union Army; that he went to Cleveland and Knoxville, Tenn., and received from Maj. Gen. D. C. Stanley, commanding First Division Tenth Army Corps, authority to raise a regiment for the United States service; that he engaged in recruiting under this authority and raised some four companies; that while engaged in this recruiting service he and a party of his men were attacked and captured by a confedertate force under Captain Rogers; that he was placed on horseback by his captors, taken some 3 miles to Edwards Ferry, Tocoa River, and there shot through the head and killed; and because of the loss of her husband while thus engaged in the military service of the United States, and in the discharge of his duty in recruiting for the Army, the widow now asks a pension.

The testimony filed to show these facts is:

That of the widow, who was with her husband at the time of his capture, at the house of one Alexander Officer, near Ducktown, Polk County, Tennessee, who followed her husband when he was taken away, and came up in time to see him shot from his horse, and found him dead when she reached him. This capture and killing was on the morning of April 6, 1864.

James Parks testifies to the loyalty of Colonel Fain, and, though not personally present, to the service and death as above stated, from information obtained at the time, as he was assisting to raise the regiment, and was at headquarters on the day of the occurrence. He says that Fain made an attempt to escape and was shot.

William Postell was a member of the regiment; on the day of the occurrence was at the house of Aaron Mathis, within 1 mile of the place of killing; saw the confederate detachment of some sixty men, under Captain Rogers, pass within 100 yards, having Colonel Fain in their possession; about fifteen minutes after heard the report of guns; went and found Colonel Fain lying dead, being shot through the head; made a personal examination.

Many other witnesses testify to his loyalty, his recruiting service, and his death.

General Stanley, under date of December 13, 1870, certifies to having given Colonel Fain permission to recruit a regiment of the mountaineers of Tennessee, Georgia, and the Carolinas; and that proper authority for this purpose was issued from the headquarters of General Thomas.

From the testimony there can be no doubt as to the facts: Mr. Fain was a Union man; was authorized to raise a regiment for the Army; was engaged in this work when he was captured and shot, in an effort to escape, by the confederate forces under Captain Rogers. Had Mr. Fain lived to complete his regiment he would have undoubtedly been commissioned as a colonel, and having lost his life while engaged in the public service, we believe the widow should be pensioned.

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment adding "and pay her the pension allowed to the widow of a captain."

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES SAVERCOOL.

Mr. RANDALL. After sitting for an hour watching for a case reported by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PIDCOCK] I was called out for a few moments, and, in my absence, I understand that bill was passed over. It is the bill (H. R. 6824) granting a pension to James Savercool.

The CHAIRMAN. It was passed over because no demand was made for its consideration.

Mr. LONG. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania call it up now.

Mr. RANDALL. If there be no objection, I now call up that bill for consideration.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Savercool, late of the United States Navy.

Mr. WINANS. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6824) granting a pension to James Savercool, having considered the same, submit the following report:

The claimant enlisted in the United States Navy August 27, 1864, and was discharged June 2, 1865.

He served as fireman on the United States steamer Nipsic, and near Boston, Mass., in March, 1865, from exposure and hardships, contracted scurvy, a disease which caused sores on his limbs, spongy gums, and weakness of back.

His claim for pension was submitted for admission in the Pension Office June 18, 1885, and resubmitted for admission August 5, 1885, after a careful examination of all claimant's witnesses by special examiners of the Pension Office, who recommended the claim for admission, but rejected August 14, 1885, on the ground that there is no record of alleged disability and claimant's inability to furnish evidence to satisfactorily establish the origin of the same in the service. Claimant's soundness at enlistment was testified to by several credible witnesses before the special examiner, and four of his comrades in service testify to his illness in service, in March, 1865, at the time of contraction of alleged disease of scurvy, but are unable to state the nature of claimant's disease; that he was in hospital, and some of them testify that they went to see him in hospital and saw a rough, scabby rash on his legs.

The inability of the witnesses to positively assert that the disease with which claimant was troubled in service was scurvy undoubtedly caused the rejection of the claim by the reviewer in the Pension Office. The records show that the claimant entered the Chelsea Hospital and was treated from April 20, 1865, until discharge, May 30, 1865, for erysipelas, extending to the foot. M. Rosaline Fitch testified before the special examiner that she has charge of her late father, Dr. James C. Fitch's books; that they show seven or eight visits charged to claimant's account from 1862 to April, 1865, and twelve visits in 1876, 1877, and 1879; that cash visits would not be charged, and that she has seen claimant at her father's house a number of times.

Dr. A. L. Gibbs testified that he has treated two of claimant's children within the last three years for eczema, which could not be cured, being seated in their blood. It broke out in sores over the legs, arms, face, and body.

Dr. George D. Fitch testified that he distinctly recollects that he heard his father, the late Dr. Fitch, say that claimant had scurvy, heard him say so about ten days after his return from the army.

Dr. L. C. Osmun testified that he treated claimant in 1879 and 1880 for scurvy; lower limbs swollen, inflamed; bowels alternately relaxed and costive; sponginess of gums, with bleeding on slight irritation; limbs congested and broken out in little pustules; feet also swollen; face sometimes puffed, but not sore; trouble most in warm weather; suffered from general debility; no evidence of syphilis; habits correct.

Many of claimant's neighbors testified that since discharge from the Navy he has been a constant sufferer from this dreadful disease, having nasty red sores on his limbs, with general weakness of limbs and back, which has largely incapacitated him for work.

The special examiner in his report says: Dr. Fitch, whose original testimony appears in the case, should be believed, as he was a good physician and careful about giving testimony in pension claims; he stated that he treated the man for scurvy when he returned from the service, and his testimony is corroborated by the statement of his son, Dr. G. D. Fitch. Another fact favorable to the case is the reticence usually observed by persons afflicted with skin disease. The evidence shows conclusively that he had scurvy or some disease of the cuticle, at least, at discharge, and that he has it now, and I should therefore recommend the allowance of the claim. The examining surgeon rated the claimant's disability one-half to three-quarters.

Your committee, realizing that this case is a meritorious one, recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JACOB CASE.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. WINANS) was the bill (H. R. 8835) granting a pension to Jacob Case.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob Case, late of Company D, Thirtieth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ABRAHAM P. GRIGGS.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration by (Mr. WINANS) was the the bill (H. R. 8834) granting a pension to Abraham P. Griggs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Abraham P. Griggs, late of Company B, First Regiment New Jersey Cavalry.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. ERMENTROUT) was the bill (H. R. 8836) granting a pension to John Miller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Miller, late of Company A, Thirty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AARON GARIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. SWOPE) was the bill (H. R. 8830) granting a pension to Aaron Garris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Aaron Garris, late of Company C, Twentieth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 6, strike out "Garris" and insert "Garis."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

B. FRANK PATTERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. NEECE) was the bill (S. 1390) for the relief of B. Frank Patterson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of B. Frank Patterson, late of Company F, Fourteenth New Jersey Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions of the pension laws.

Mr. MATSON. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1390) for the relief of B. Frank Patterson, having examined the same, submit the following report:

The claimant was mustered into service August 26, 1862, as first sergeant of Company F, Fourteenth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers; was promoted to be second lieutenant of the same company and regiment on November 19, 1863, and discharged April 1, 1864, on account of disability.

The basis of this soldier's claim is disease of the bladder and kidneys, contracted in 1862 while in the line of his duty, and for which he was treated by Dr. A. Treganowan, the surgeon of his regiment; and the further cause of disability, that while on the march from Gettysburg to Williamsport, Md., in the attempt to jump a ditch he fell backward and received severe injuries in his spine, from which he never recovered and is now almost wholly disabled.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that his disabilities did not arise while in the line of his duty.

Dr. Treganowan and Dr. J. B. Goodenough and two neighbors testify that at enlistment the claimant was a sound, healthy man, and free from any disease or disability whatever.

Dr. A. Treganowan, surgeon of claimant's regiment, testifies that claimant was attended by him for catarrh of the bladder and inflammation of the kidneys in 1862, while at Monocacy, Md., and remained under his medical care almost continuously for the same difficulty until the date of his discharge from the service on surgeon's cirtificate of disability in December, 1863, and that said certificate of disability was granted by him while surgeon of the regiment, and that said disability was contracted in the service while in the discharge of duty.

John C. Patterson, captain and major of same regiment, testifies that near Williamsport, Md., in July, 1863, claimant in jumping a ditch fell backward and hurt his back and spine and never recovered from it. His first sickness was while lying in camp at Monocacy Junction in the winter of 1862 and 1863.

George W. White, corporal Company G, and Guaudin Hampton, private Company D, both of same regiment, testify that near Williamsport, Md., July 10, 1863, claimant in jumping a ditch fell backward in it and injured his back and spine so that he could not walk for several days, and was unfit for duty for some time. They state they were eye-witnesses to the injury.

Dr. J. B. Goodenough again testifies that in the summer of 1865, he thinks July, he was called on by claimant for medical treatment and found him suffering from disease of kidneys and great nervous prostration; that claimant is completely broken down by a complication of diseases brought on by exposure in the army.

Dr. H. W. Garrison testifies that he treated claimant during the years 1880 and 1881 for nasal catarrh, neuralgia of head, spine, kidneys, and stomach; that claimant is unable to perform manual labor, and at times confined to his bed. During the years 1880 and 1881 he believes his disability to have been one-half; that he knows nothing of claimant's condition prior to 1880, and that in his opinion said disability was caused by exposure to malarial influence and hardships while in the service.

Neighbors of claimant who have known him intimately for twenty-five years testify that he has been afflicted with neuralgia of bladder and kidneys and head and nervous prostration, so that he could not get out of bed a great part of the time, and not able at any time to perform manual labor, the least exertion causing great weakness, being weak across the back and groins. There are no records of this regiment on file in the office of the Surgeon-General.

The claimant testifies very strongly that he never had any venereal disease before his service, in the service, or since his discharge, and there is no testimony on file which would show to the contrary.

There is no doubt but that the disease of bladder and kidneys with which claimant suffers resulted from malarial troubles and his weakened condition after receiving the injury to his spine.

The physicians who testify are reported to be men of ability and of good standing, and their opinion as to the cause of said disability should be entitled to great credit.

This man was a good soldier, and his record as a soldier is good. He remained on duty even while suffering from complicated disease, until he was physically unable to perform his duties, and finally received an honorable discharge.

The committee therefore, believing this to be a worthy and deserving case, recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ZEBULON S. TOMPKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. RANDALL) was the bill (S. 2067) for increase of pension to Zebulon S. Tompkins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Zebulon S. Tompkins, late of Company E, Sixth New Jersey Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month, in lieu of the amount now received by him under the law.

Mr. MATSON called for the reading of the report, but withdrew the call after the Clerk had read three or four lines.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. It is now 10 o'clock, and I renew my request to be permitted to call up out of its order the bill I have indicated.

Objection was made.

JOSHUA ARMSTRONG.

The next pension bill called up for consideration (by Mr. BINGHAM) was the bill (H. R. 2027) granting a pension to Joshua Armstrong.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorzed and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joshua Armstrong, dependent father of John E. Armstrong, late of Company A, Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry.

Mr. WALLACE. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. BINGHAM. This is the case of a dependent father, and the pension is granted under the provisions and limitations of the pension law.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the report is called for.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2027) granting a pension to Joshua Armstrong, respectfully report:

Joshua Armstrong applied for pension to the Pension Department, April 5, 1880, as the dependent father of John E. Armstrong, who enlisted April 2, 1875, in Company A, Seventh United States Cavalry, and was killed in the battle of the Little Big Horn River, Montana Territory, June 25, 1876.

The Pension Bureau rejected the claim on the ground that the soldier left surviving a minor child, who is still living.

The birth of soldier's child, Ida Matilda, September 8, 1858, and child, Mary Emma, born January 26, 1861, is shown by verified copy of church record. Child Mary Emma was sixteen years of age January 26, 1877.

The facts of this case are briefly as follows: At the expiration of a previous term of service John E. Armstrong returned to his home with the intention of quitting the trade of war, and of resuming the arts of peace in the bosom of his family. But when he reached his home he found that the history of Enoch Arden had been repeated in his own case. When he enlisted he left a wife and two children; when he returned he found his wife living with another man and in a condition for—hich he disclaimed all responsibility. As soon as he realized the situation, and it required only a glance at the figure of his wife, in profile, he again left, re-enlisted April 2, 1875, and was killed as stated at the battle of Little Big Horn, June 25, 1876.

The two daughters whom he had by his wife are of age and married; the other child which his wife had he disclaimed all responsibility for.

It is in evidence that the soldier lived with his father prior to enlistment, and that he contributed to his support, sending him at one time as much as $100 out of his pay for that purpose.

The father is old and suffering from senile affections, as described by the examining surgeon. His claim for a pension was rejected by the Pension Department because at the time of the filing of his application there was a minor child surviving. As she is now of age and married, your committee think that, as this objection no longer exists, the father should receive the asked-for relief, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JONAS SCHOONOVER.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. WINANS) was the bill (H. R. 8663) to increase the pension of Jonas Schoonover.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to increase the pension of Jonas Schoonover, late colonel of the Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers (who is now on the pension-roll under certificate of invalid pensions numbered ——, at the rate of $30 per month), to $72 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 8 strike out "$72" and insert "$40."

Mr. WINANS. I withdraw the call for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. PRICE. I move that it be reported with the recommendation that it be laid on the table. This is one of the objectionable bills.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that as the gentleman who introduced this bill is absent it be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. ELLSBERRY. I would rather have the bill acted upon to-night. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

The files in this case show that claimant enlisted as a private soldier October 3, 1861.. That he served faithfully in the Twenty-ninth Ohio Volunteers until July 13, 1865. During the four years of service he served as private, lieutenant, captain, major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel, having won his promotions by gallant and meritorious service. He is now receiving a pension of $30 per month on account of rheumatism. Under the existing laws the Pension Office can allow no more, as the soldier does not require the constant aid and attention of another person, and there being no grade between the rate of $30 for total inability to perform any manual labor and the rate of $50 for total helplessness.

The facts in this case seem to be that for several months each year for the past five years this claimant has been bedfast and totally helpless from the disability incurred in the Army, namely, rheumatism; while during the remainder of the year he is able to dress himself and with difficulty get around the room and on the street.

Dr. A. E. Foltz, his family physician, after giving a very careful description of the case, adds:

"During the winter of 1881 and 1882 he was confined to his bed and utterly helpless; nearly all the joints of the upper and lower extremities were involved, being acutely inflamed, red, swollen, and very painful, lasting about three months. Each succeeding winter he has had similar attacks. He presents all the disastrous joint affections of chronic articular rheumatism with winter attacks of the acute disease."

Dr. W. C. Jacobs corrpborates the above, and adds that he does not believe he can ever be any better. A. B. Kuder and O. W. Hale corroborate this, and add that for past six months the claimant has been the most of the time unable to walk at all.

While this case is not one of utter helplessness, entitling him to $50, it certainly approximates very closely to it, and the claimant deserves more than the comrade who is simply disabled from performing any labor.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out the words "seventy-two," in line 8, and inserting the word "forty."

Mr. PRICE. I renew my motion that this bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to say in regard to this bill, Mr. Chairman, that I have examined every paper in that case, and a more meritorious application has not been before this House during this session. This man for four or five months of the year is entirely helpless.

If he continued to be helpless during the remainder of the year he would be entitled to $50 a month. As it is he only gets $40 a month. We have repeatedly acted upon just such cases, and it has been customary with the committee where helplessness exists, as in this case, to allow the difference between $30 and $50, according to the character of the disability.

Mr. MATSON. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin state the ground of his objection?

Mr. PRICE. My chief objection is that we ought not to raise a man who is getting $30 while many are getting nothing. Now, when you come to figures, the half difference between $30 and $50 is $40. If this man was disabled half the year, he would get that.

Four months, or one-third of the year, this man is disabled, but one-third of the difference would not be $40, yet you propose to give him this amount as if he was disabled half the year. I know you are going to vote the bill through, and it does not make much difference what argument is made against it.

The question being taken on the amendment of the committee, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIBBIE C. MONTIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1836) for the relief of Libbie C. Montis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension-laws, the name of Mahlon D. Montis, late a private in Company G of the Second Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, commanded by Col. William Irvin, and to place the name of Libbie C. Montis on the pension-roll as the widow of said pensioner, deceased.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1836) for the relief of Libbie C. Montis, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to refer to the annexed report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which they adopt as their own, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments:

Strike out all after the word "of," in line 5, and including the word "of," in line 7; also strike out all after the word "Montis," in line 7, and insert therein instead the words "widow of Mahlon D. Montis, late a private in Company G of the Second Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, war with Mexico;" so as to read after the word "of," in line 7, as follows: "Libbie C. Montis, widow of Mahlon D. Montis, late a private in Company G of the Second Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, war with Mexico."

That it appears from the papers in this case that Libbie C. Montis is the widow of Mahlon D. Montis, a private in Capt. James E. Harle's Company G, Second Ohio Volunteers, in the war with Mexico in 1847. That while in the service he contracted a disease in the line of his duty, which became chronic and made him an invalid throughout his life, and for which he was pensioned.

From patriotic impulses he attempted to enlist during the last war, but was rejected for physical disability. At the urgent call of the Government for one-hundred-day troops he did enlist and served for that time, and was honorably discharged on the 2d day of September, 1861, at Columbus, Ohio. In consequence of thus volunteering his name was dropped from the pension-roll, and he finally died of a complication of diseases which had their origin in the disease contracted while he was a soldier in the Mexican war and for which he was originally pensioned.

Declaration for pension filed December 28, 1885; claim rejected January 27, 1886, on the ground that the "death cause not due to service."

The statement of claimant is substantiated by affidavit of Mahlon D. Montis, dated May 23, 1851, as to the disease, which was contracted at or near Jalapa, Mexico, in July, 1848. Also the affidavit of James E. Harle, captain Company G, Second Ohio Volunteers (war with Mexico), dated May 23, 1851. Also affidavits of T. R. Robie, M. D., and J. H. Officer, M. D., dated May 23, 1851, corroborating original statement as to the disease contracted while a soldier in the war with Mexico; also, by affidavit of W. T. McMahon, M. D., dated May 7, 1875, that he had treated this soldier as his family physician since 1864 for the disease contracted in Mexico, which was at first and for many years chronic diarrhea, which emaciated him very much, and as a result this soldier had at first nervous difficulties, which finally resulted in epilepsy, which caused his death.

The statement is further corroborated by the certificate of the board of examining surgeons, dated March 27, 1875, as to the condition of this soldier at that time, and they say that he was then "so disabled by disease as to be entitled to a pension of $8 per month," and is signed by J. B. G. Baxter, M. D.; N. F. Graham, M. D.; William Grinsted, M. D., and Luther C. Cox, examining surgeons.

The statement is further corroborated by an affidavit signed by S. S. Stearns, M. D., dated November 5, 1883, setting forth the fact that his disease was contracted during the Mexican war; also affidavit of Adolph Behrend, M. D., dated December 6, 1883, to the same effect.

The soldier died July 16, 1885.

Taking into consideration all the evidence filed in this case, your committee believe it to be their duty to report in favor of this bill and recommend its passage.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LONG. Is it in order to ask consent to call up a bill out of its regular order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order. The bills are called up in their order upon the Calendar by order of the committee.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 12, noes 20.

HENRY BELLION.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee I desire to state that a bill was inadvertently omitted on my part and passed over by the House. It is on page 52 of the Calendar, for the relief of Henry Bellion. I ask consent of the House to go back and take up this bill and put it upon its passage.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to place the name of Henry Bellion, of Portland, Oreg., on the pension-roll, on account of a disability contracted in the service of the United States Army, in Company E, First Regiment United States Dragoons.

The report (by Mr. LANDES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1217) granting a pension to Henry Bellion, have examined the same, and report:

That the facts upon which this bill is founded are set forth in the report made by the Senate committee, which report is accepted as the report of this committee, and is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 611, Forth-ninth Congress, first session.]

The application of the petitioner was rejected by the Pension Office on account of his inability to furnish satisfactory testimony connecting the alleged disabilities with the service and line of duty.

The Adjutant-General's report says:

"Henry Bellion enlisted on the 12th day of February, 1855, and was assigned to Company E, First Regiment of the United States Dragoons, and that he was discharged February 12, 1860, by reason of expiration of service. Muster-rolls reporting him absent or present do not show nature of disability."

The Surgeon-General's report says that Private Henry Bellion, Company E, First Regiment Dragoons, was sent to hospital, Fort Walla Walla, Washington Territory, October 2, 1857, with gunshot wound.

Both the Adjutant and the Surgeon General admit that the records are defective.

The board of examining surgeons find: "A ball has struck his right leg about midway of its length, outside the tibia, and been removed." The right index finger has been injured and amputated. They also find inguinal hernia, requiring use of truss.

The soldier avers that he is unable to learn whether the surgeon of his regiment is living or dead; that many of his comrades, immediately after discharge, enlisted in the Union service, and he has never heard of them since, and that it is impossible to furnish the testimony required.

In view of all the circumstances the committee feel that it is only an act of justice to concede some relief to this man.

The bill is reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to ask any favor for myself, but I would ask unanimous consent that each member of the committee here present have consent to call up one case out of the regular order.

Mr. MATSON. I must object to that. We can not get around at this late hour of the night.

Mr. LONG. But some of us can get around. [Laughter.] [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Chairman, coming as I do to the House so late in the session I had hoped it would not be necessary for me to rise for the expression of my views on any subject but that I could satisfy myself in voting my sentiments. But this legislation here to-night, I may be permitted to say, seems so extraordinary and so subversive of what I consider proper and right and consistent legislation, that I deem it my duty to enter a protest. Thirty-five men, it seems, can draw from the Treasury the money of the United States for a large amount of pensions, disbursing the funds of the Government indiscriminately in granting special acts of relief. The precedent is bad and the system infamous.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to ask to what bill he is speaking.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no bill before the committee, and the gentleman is not now in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman can make his speech when a bill is under consideration.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg pardon; I thought a bill had been read.

JAMES F. SALYERS.

The next business on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. 3948) granting a pension to James F. Salyers.

Mr. WINANS. I ask consideration of that bill.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James F. Salyers, late a private in Company B, Eighteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Chairman, it is very disagreeable to me——

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman excuse me? Has consideration been asked for this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It has, and the bill has been read.

Mr. WALLACE. It is very disagreeable to me to make this movement or take this step. Coming, as I have said, so lately into the House I feel it somewhat presumptuous that so new a member should endeavor to interpose an objection to this method of legislation, which I understand has been in existence some eighteen months. But it seems to me, with the precedents which have gone before and in view of the recent veto messages of the President of the United States, I am not entirely alone in feeling this to be an outrageous form of legislation. I do not only allude to it in the case of pensions, but my protest is to this system of legislation, no matter what may be the object for which the money is being appropriated.

I should object to it no matter for what purpose the money was drawn from the Treasury to be paid out indiscriminately upon such slight consideration as we have had here to-night. If of three hundred and twenty-five members of this House we can not get more than thirty-five who take an interest in pensions, I think it would be a very good idea for us to abolish this practice of holding special pension sessions. While I do not desire to call a quorum on these bills to-night, I shall certainly at the next meeting of this kind that is held enter my protest and call a quorum if the attendance be so limited as it is this evening.

It is very far indeed from my mind to make any opposition to pensions. I am in favor of all legitimate and rightful pensions; and whenever there is a proposition to give a pension to a man who has served his country, and in rendering that service has received a wound or contracted an illness of a character to keep him from earning a living and taking his part in the struggle of life, I shall accord it my vote most cheerfully.

But I have seen this evening several bills passed simply on the report of a committee. That committee is not infallible. Several of its reports have been changed, reversed, and seventeen of these bills vetoed. It seems to me clear that thirty-odd members of the House have no right to take the public money which should be a sacred trust with them and with each member of the House and vote it away in this manner.

I have no doubt that certain of my friends on the other side, who do not think politically as I do, will say, "That is because he comes from the South."

I desire to say, sir, that I come from a section of the New South, that has forgotten the war—a South of peace and harmony among men. I am happy to say that I do not believe there is one man who comes from my section who would raise that question or desire to hear it raised on this floor. Therefore I disclaim all feeling of sectionalism, I disclaim all prejudice against pensions; but I should most earnestly protest against any form of legislation drawing money from the Treasury for any purpose whatsoever by so limited a body as we have here to-night, and especially in the manner in which this legislation has gone on, without even hearing many of the reports made from the committee read. I have heard a pension voted to a man who died long since the war from a disease of the liver, a disease which may come on at any time suddenly, and which carries its victim off without very long suffering, and could not have been the result of a war twenty years ago.

As I understand it there has been a sort of agreement between parties here that these pension bills shall be allowed to pass in this way, but I wish to say I can not consent to sit by at any future meeting without calling a quorum if the attendance is as small as it is here to-night. I do not say that I shall call a quorum if a large body or a respectable body of members shall be in attendance. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMES. I would like to ask the gentleman to inform us what he would regard as a respectable number, so that we may try to be prepared to do business at our next meeting.

Mr. WALLACE. I prefer to withhold that information for the present.

Mr. PERKINS. And I would like to ask the gentleman if this legislation would be more meritorious than it is if the House were full?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. Whatever the full House would do by a majority they have a right to do, and they would be responsible for it.

Mr. LONG. Would the gentleman from Louisiana think it worth while to consider this particular case, to let the report be read and let us determine whether the case is a meritorious one?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not alluding to this particular case, but to the general practice in regard to these special pension bills.

Mr. LONG. But would it not be well to have the report in this case read and the case considered?

Mr. PRICE. I want to ask the gentleman from Louisiana how in the nature of things the State that he represents in part could have received at one time $1,000,000 and at another time $300,000 which was purely local in its benefits if we had been sticklers for a quorum at the time we voted those appropriations in the Forty-eighth Congress?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not profess to be responsible for what was done by any legislative body in which a quorum was not present. I was not here. I would object to thirty-five men voting away $1,000,000 for any purpose in my or any district.

Mr. PRICE. Then I understand the gentleman only became responsible for the action of the American Congress when he took his seat here a few days ago. I am glad to know that.

Mr. WALLACE. I became partially responsible, and I do not wish to bear one thirty-fifth part of this responsibility either. I simply make to-night the announcement I have that there may be no unpleasant feeling if at any future meeting I should make the point I have indicated and raise that issue.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion? It has frequently occurred that even when one of the regular appropriation bills involving a very large amount of money was under consideration this House sat in Committee of the Whole with only 90 voting.

Mr. WALLACE. But with the larger part of the members present.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. BRADY. Why we passed the legislative appropriation bill a few days ago, appropriating about $20,000,000, and I am sure there was not a quorum present at the time.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER. I fully agree with all the gentleman says regarding the importance of strictly and zealously guarding the Treasury. I fully concur with the gentleman that it is the duty of Congress to carefully consider every pension bill and to vote down every bill which is not meritorious; but I can not agree with him that bills of this character would be more carefully considered if every member was in this Hall.

My experience has taught me that the Committee on Pensions take all proper care to guard against imposition. I believe some four thousand pension bills have been referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions and but five hundred have received favorable consideration.

The reports made by the committee are printed and placed before each member of the House, and my experience has taught me that with fifty to seventy members present we more fully understand each case than we would if all the members were here giving their usual attention to what is going on in the House. The gentleman from Louisiana must have observed that the noise and confusion of a full House makes it difficult for any member to fully understand the proceedings, and it often happens that but very few seem to understand the questions at issue.

To impose legislation of a private nature upon all the members of the House would go very far to retard business, and I can not think it would prevent the passage of a single bill which would not be rejected by the members who are present to-night. It is frequently the case that questions come up which members think should be brought before the full House, and such propositions very seldom meet with objection.

The gentleman will therefore observe, notwithstanding the fact that fewer members are present at evening sessions, those few are enabled to give subjects brought before them better attention than is usually given them by three hundred and twenty-five members.

Mr. WALLACE. As I understand, all these bills coming before the House on Friday nights are cases that have been rejected at the Department.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. WALLACE. And the prima facie evidence is that there is something wrong about them. If the business of this House is to be left entirely to committees, then the House as it stands is entirely too large. There are three branches of the Government before which these bills must come—the House, the Senate, and the President. How is it possible for the Executive of this country to give proper consideration to bills which are sent to him at the rate at which these pension bills are sent, and at the same time give due consideration to important matters of general legislation submitted for his approval?

A MEMBER. That is not our fault; it is his lookout.

Mr. WALLACE. It is the "lookout" of those who desire good government. The President of the country does earnestly desire it, and in the conscientious discharge of his duties desires to examine these bills which are sent to him. He can not do more than a certain amount of work in a given time, and consequently has to allow many pension bills to become laws without his signature. I am informed that as many as two hundred have been placed in his hands at once. How is it possible for him in the course of ten days to give such a mass of bills mature consideration? To send him bills in this way is unfair to him, unjust to the people, and without proper regard for the interests of the Treasury. Under such circumstances as these it is impossible that pension cases can be considered in the thorough manner that they should be.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman allow me one suggestion?

Mr. WALLACE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. I desire to make a single suggestion, and I do it in good faith. The gentleman claims that it is desirable to give each one of these bills careful consideration. Now, how can the gentleman give to this particular bill before us at this moment more careful consideration than by having the report read, examining the circumstances for himself, speaking upon it if he so desires, interrogating the committee that reported it, and ascertaining how far they have looked into the matter? Is not such a course preferable to dealing, as we are now dealing, in generalities, which in no way contribute to the understanding of the legislation before us?

Mr. WALLACE. So far as I have observed there have not been more than two or three requests to-night for the reading of the reports, except requests made by myself.

Mr. LONG. Let me ask the gentleman whether he has carried his investigation so far as to examine the reports or interrogate the committee so as to satisfy himself in regard to the propriety of the reports. If he had done so, I am sure he would have found that, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has stated, these cases have in general been carefully investigated by the committees. Certainly the gentleman would arrive at the merits of any particular case much more directly and satisfactorily by having the bill and report read.

Mr. WALLACE. I can not undertake to come here and be the only one to ask for the reading of reports. I can not stand here as the great demander of that proceeding. I do not want to occupy any such position.

Mr. LONG. That is substantially the very position which the gentleman proposes to take hereafter by insisting upon a quorum; he proposes to make himself the arbiter hereafter of all pension legislation.

Mr. WALLACE. I only propose to do that in regard to pension legislation which I consider improper. I make no objection to any other kind of pension legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course the gentleman knows that every member of the House is furnished with a copy of the bill and report in every case.

Mr. PERKINS. Do I understand the gentleman from Louisiana to say that he thinks all this pension legislation is wrong?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not. A part of it is wrong and a part of it is right. That is exactly my view. I think that a great deal of this pension legislation is meritorious. A great many persons for whose benefit pension bills are brought into the House deserve to receive pensions; and I am in favor of granting pensions in all cases where men are worthy of them—where it can be shown that they have while in the military service received wounds or incurred disease from which they suffer.

But I am not prepared to say that pensions should be granted, as they are here in many cases, where the disability can not be traced to any service in the war, where a great deal must be taken for granted as to the facts of the case, and where the bills are passed without any consideration and by a very small vote. I do not think that is proper legislation, and with a large body of members in attendance I do not believe it would be passed.

Mr. NEECE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; for a question.

Mr. NEECE. Does not the gentleman know that the Pension Bureau in many instances asks the House to pass private bills?

Mr. WALLACE. Some of them, yes. I say and I affirm I am not opposed to a few of these bills, but there are a great many I am opposed to. I say furthermore I am opposed to any legislation which takes out of the Treasury of the Government the large amount of money this pension service does, or any other service of the same size and character, by so small a body of members assembled in this House at these night sessions out of a large number of members composing the House itself.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is not the gentleman familiar with the fact, not only in this Congress but in preceding Congresses, the deliberation, consideration, and conclusion of pension legislation has always been accepted by the House as being done on Friday or any other evening fixed for that purpose, when but a limited number of the House, as has always been the case, is in attendance? It is known to the House and the country that gentlemen come here simply for the consideration of their own cases. It is a time of watchfulness on their part to see that those cases come up in their turn and are properly considered.

At these evening sessions of Congress but a limited number of members attend. They take the Calendar, which is printed, and they see the cases which are likely to be taken up and considered, and if it is not likely those in which they are interested will come up they do not come to the House. If those cases are reported by the committee favorably and are placed upon the Calendar for consideration at these night sessions, the assumption is, of course, they are good cases for the House to pass.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not proof always the case is a good one.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman should take exception to the specific case and not take exception generally as to the wisdom of this whole legislation.

Mr. WALLACE. Then in order to understand each one of these cases I would be compelled to call for the reading of the report of the committee accompanying it, and I do not wish to set myself up here as a reformer by being the only one to call for the reading of the reports of committees. There is a much surer way to reach that result, and that is to provide these reports shall be read in every case. Such has not been the practice. In order to force these cases through the reading of the reports is nearly always omitted.

Mr. PERKINS. Do I understand the gentleman from Louisiana to say while in his judgment much of this legislation is right, nevertheless it should be rejected?

Mr. WALLACE. No; I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. PERKINS. Or that it should not be considered in these evening sessions unless a respectable number of members of the House is present to consider them?

Mr. WALLACE. I believe a fair and proper representation of a legislative body like the House of Representatives, which consists of three hundred and twenty-five members, should be present at these night sessions to consider any question where disbursements from the Treasury of the Government are to take effect.

Mr. LONG. Is it not a matter of fact, let me ask the gentleman, we will get a better consideration of these bills to-night than if the House were full?

Mr. WALLACE. No; I do not think so. Only those come here who have bills they desire to pass. Those who have no bills do not come at all. They go to the various places of amusement. This is known as pension night, and those who have pension cases come here and attend to them; those who have no business of that character remain away, and each one present being anxious to secure adoption of his own bill is not likely to be critical of his neighbor's.

Mr. LONG. What does the gentleman suggest as to considering this bill now and having the report read?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not taking issue against any report or against any particular bill. [Cries of "Vote!"] I am making these remarks to-night so it may not be charged in the future that I take the House by surprise if I shall make this motion and call a quorum and thereby overthrow an established custom. I wish to do nothing that may tend to throw the course of business here into chaos [cries of "No!" on the Republican side] or of being in any way an impediment to proper legislation.

A MEMBER. No, not chaos. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALLACE. If the gentleman does not know what chaos means he can send for a dictionary. He probably thinks I mean a place much hotter than this. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Having been lectured by the gentleman from Louisiana, I hope the House will be allowed to proceed with the consideration of these pension cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The report in this case having been called for, it will be read.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3948) granting a pension to James F. Salyers, submit the following report:

James F. Salyers enlisted as a private in Company B, Eighteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, on 18th October, 1861, and was discharged for disability July 1, 1862; filed claim for pension July 2, 1879, alleging injury to knee-cap of left leg. His claim was rejected May 1, 1881, on the ground that the disability was not incurred in the line of duty.

The facts, as shown by the records and proof on file in the Pension Office, are as follows:

After enlistment, and while the soldier was absent on furlough, he had an encounter with confederates in a hand-to-hand engagement, in which he received a cut near the left knee. He was not mustered until February 8, 1862. After he had received the cut aforesaid, regimental surgeon testified as follows:

"That when claimant enlisted, October 18, 1861, he was perfectly sound. When the regiment was mustered into the service, February 8, 1862, I examined him. He had, about two weeks after he enlisted, while on a furlough at his home in Grant County, been attacked by some rebels, and in the skirmish that followed received a cut with a knife across the tendon of the extensor muscles of the thigh, a couple of inches above the upper margin of the patella, which had healed up, apparently sound, so that he was regularly performing soldier's duty; consequently we received him and had him mustered in about the 1st of March, 1862.

"While on duty with his company at Nicholasville, Ky., there being sleet on the ground at the time, he received a fall, the force of which lacerated the ligaments where it had been formerly cut. About a week after came under affiant's treatment. The thigh, and, in fact, the whole limb, was terribly swelled; it suppurated and confined him for two months in bed. He partially recovered, with ligaments elongated, the patella falling below the knee, leaving the limb weakened, so that he was discharged."

This captain testifies as follows:

"That March 1, 1862, at Nicholasville, Ky., while returning from guard duty, slipped and fell, the ground being covered with ice, upon his knee with such violence as to cause a rupture of the conjoined tendon and other relative parts of the left knee-cap, dislocating the same and causing it to slip down some two or three inches below the proper position, in which situation it yet remains. Was present when claimant received said injury."

The Pension Office rejected the claim on the ground that the present disability was traceable to the cut, and that the cut was received while claimant was absent on furlough.

Your committee believe that while the said cut may have been the remote cause, the injury received from the fall superinduced the development of whatever injury resulted from the cut, and is the direct cause of the present disability, which was unquestionably received while in line of duty. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MATSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration pension bills upon the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole were severally considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 6132) granting a pension to William Lynch;

A bill (H. R. 7698) granting a pension to Robert K. Bennett;

A bill (H. R. 7327) granting a pension to Anthony McRobertson;

A bill (H. R. 8374) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary M. Gillham;

A bill (H. R. 7517) for the relief of Warren L. Rice;

A bill (H. R. 8977) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Samuel Bulman;

A bill (H. R. 6824) granting a pension to James Savercool;

A bill (H. R. 8835) granting a pension to Jacob Case;

A bill (H. R. 8834) granting a pension to Abraham P. Griggs,

A bill (H. R. 8836) granting a pension to John Miller;

A bill (H. R. 2027) granting a pension to Joshua Armstrong; and

A bill (H. R. 3948) granting a pension to James F. Salyers.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, were severally considered, the amendments concurred in, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 6523) granting a pension to Henry Roscoe;

A bill (H. R. 7712) granting a pension to Virginia Taylor Randall;

A bill (H. R. 9106) granting a pension to Rachael Barnes;

A bill (H. R. 260) for the relief of Margaret S. Fain;

A bill (H. R. 8663) to increase the pension of Jonas Schoonover; and

A bill (H. R. 8830) granting a pension to Aaron Garis.

The title of the latter bill was amended so as to conform to the action of the committee.

Senate bills of the following titles were severally considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 810) granting a pension to Charles J. Estey;

A bill (S. 1390) for the relief of B. Frank Patterson;

A bill (S. 2067) for an increase of pension to Zebulon S. Tompkins; and

A bill (S. 1217) for the relief of Henry Bellion.

The bill (S. 1836) for the relief of Libbie C. Montis was considered, the amendment recommended by the committee agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be read the third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLIN moved to reconsider the several votes by which bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I ask a separate vote on Senate bill 1133.

Mr. WINANS. I ask a separate vote on Senate bill 2192.

The bill (S. 1224) granting a pension to Henry H. Stutsman, reported adversely from the Committee of the Whole, was considered, and the adverse recommendation concurred in.

MARGARET HUNTER HARDIE.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (S. 1133) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Hunter Hardie.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest that this bill, having reached its third reading, and the other bill (S. 2192) about which there is considerable diversity of opinion, be reported to the full House, especially as one of these provides for an increase of pension merely because there is an increase of necessity on the part of the pensioner, as claimed by the applicant.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope this bill will not be laid aside for that purpose; let us pass it now.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In this connection I want to suggest that where the soldier is disabled that enters in as an element; but the law fixes the pension as to widows, and the increasing disability of the widow herself has not been heretofore taken as an element in determining the amount of pension. I think therefore the gentleman should allow it to take that course.

Mr. RANDALL. This is one of the most meritorious bills; and it is quite unfortunate the gentleman should have selected such a bill to make the issue upon.

There is no objection to the bill that I know of except that of the gentleman from Wisconsin, who objects upon principle, and for whose convictions I have the highest possible respect. But I do not want this particular bill picked out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent; and assumes, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that there is objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not desire to make the point of no quorum——

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not do that. To go and pick out a particular bill——

Mr. McMILLIN. I beg to say any bill where the ground for the increase of pension is merely the increase of poverty or debility of the widow should not pass except by a vote in a full House.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not the case with this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. There is one of these bills which has that feature. If it is not the case in this bill I do not oppose it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is not the case with the other bill either. That circumstance merely happened to be mentioned.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not propose to make the point on the bill that has not that ingredient in it.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand that this bill has that feature. I will not say it has not, as I am careful what I say. I rest the passage of this bill on what is stated in the report, and if the gentleman chooses to object I can not help it.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative; and the bill was passed.

ABBY L. BURBANK.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (S. 2192) granting a pension to Abby L. Burbank; reported with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is the case which was put on the ground of increased debility of the widow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not object to the third reading.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 7.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman who has charge of this bill to let it go over by consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not consent.

Mr. WINANS. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. WINANS, and the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. GALLINGER.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, the Speaker pro tempore stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 13.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to make a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 1133) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Hunter Hardie was passed; and I move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Another motion is pending on which the House is dividing. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WINANS] will take their places as tellers. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 17, noes 8.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The "ayes" have it, and the bill is passed.

Mr. McMILLIN. The point as to no quorum was not withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman insists, the Chair will withdraw the announcement of the result. Gentlemen who have not voted will pass between the tellers.

Mr. ERMENTOUT. There is evidently a quorum in the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEECE. I insist that all shall be compelled to vote.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. Let the Sergeant-at-Arms bring them in.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is evident nothing can be done to-night, and I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for a moment until I make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. McMILLIN. Gentlemen have stated to me that the bill just passed is the one which embraces the ingredient I have spoken of. The RECORD will show how that is.

Mr. RANDALL. That bill has passed, and I do not want it to go over without reconsideration.

Mr. GALLINGER (one of the tellers). When the House is dividing is a motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is always in order when the House finds itself without a quorum.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will withhold the motion to adjourn that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may make the motion he has indicated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not be in order except by unanimous consent while the House is dividing on another motion.

Mr. RANDALL. It is as much so as the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the vote shows the absence of a quorum the motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. Not until the tellers have made their report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can ask unanimous consent to submit his motion.

MARGARET HUNTER HARDIE.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 1132) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Hunter Hardie was passed; and I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

There being no objection, the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. McMILLEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 14, noes 10.

And accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1990) to provide for the adjustment of matters connected with certain judicial proceedings in Pennsylvania in which the United States was a party.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it is the design of a gentleman representing the House Committee on Claims to call up this bill and have it substituted for a House bill of similar import which has been reported favorably from that committee. It seems hardly worth while, therefore, to refer this bill to the Committee on Claims; and I ask unanimous consent that it lie on the table for the present.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

RETURN OF BILL TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Senate of the 18th instant requesting the return of the bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés of the Government Printing Office.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSON, of New York, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, for four days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. Mr, Speaker, I will be unavoidably absent from the House for the next ten days, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill of the Senate No. 856 and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 856) to provide for the erection of a public buliding in the city of Dayton, Ohio.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I regret to feel obliged to object to the consideration of that bill, but I shall have to do so. It is a meritorious bill, one of the most meritorous bills of this class before the House; but I shall make no discrimination——

Mr. ROGERS. Regular order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. ROGERS. I withdraw the demand.

INSPECTOR OF HULLS AND BOILERS, DULUTH.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill No. 3504 and put it upon its passage. This simply provides for an inspector of hulls and boilers at Duluth.

The SPEAKER. There are no bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. NELSON. I will make a brief explanation, with the consent of the House.

This bill was reported adversely and laid on the table. The fact is that originally this bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce. It provides for an inspector of hulls and boilers at Duluth. The Committee on Commerce reported back a general bill including this matter, with two or three others, with reference to inspectors at other points, and recommended that the individual bills be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 4414 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by inserting, after the word "Savannah," in the second line of the sixth paragraph of said section, the words "Duluth, Minnesota."

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the table and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NELSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT DUBUQUE.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the House Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8973) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, and put the same upon its passage. This has been examined and approved by the Secretary of War, and unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. BEACH. Is that bill on the House Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is a bill to authorize a private corporation to construct a bridge at the point named.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the bill is in the usual form, it is unnecessary to take up the time of the House with reading it, and especially as it is unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the bill should be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I called for the reading of the bill, but the portion which I wished to hear has been read and is satisfactory. If no other gentleman desires the further reading I shall withdraw the call.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3034) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain citizens of Chicago, employés of the custom-house, for extra-time service, and put the same upon its passage.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

Mr. DUNHAM. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection long enough to allow a brief explanation, not exceeding two minutes.

The SPEAKER. There is objection.

LIGHT-HOUSE SUPPLY STEAMER FOR ATLANTIC AND GULF COAST.

Mr. CLARDY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 7627) to provide for the construction of a light-house supply steamer for the Atlantic and Gulf coast, with the recommendation that the House non-concur in the amendments and agree to the committee of conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the Senate amendments be read.

The amendments were read at length.

The motion to non-concur was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CLARDY, Mr. TARSNEY, and Mr. MORROW as conferees on the part of the House.

CORRECTION OF SOLDIERS' RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk. If the House will give me its attention just for a moment I will explain what there is in this bill. It is reported unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Twelfth Michigan Infantry was organized and mustered into the service in the winter of 1861–'62 and served during the war. In 1864 the regiment veteranized, and it found itself at the close of the war in Arkansas. In December, 1865, the members of the regiment, becoming impatient of their long retention in the service after peace was assured, and thinking they ought to be discharged, waited on the colonel of the regiment through a delegation of some three hundred of the command and asked to be discharged, and insisted if he took active steps toward that end they might be discharged, and that if they were not to be relieved soon they should return to their homes. The colonel thereupon telegraphed to General Reynolds, and the conference with him resulted in an order directing the muster-out of the regiment on the 15th day of February, 1866, at Jackson, Mich.

The delegation that waited upon the colonel thereupon returned to duty in the regiment and continued to serve until the hour of discharge, on the 15th February, 1866, when nine members of this regiment were confronted with an order from the War Department that they be dishonorably discharged because of their solicitation in 1865 to be relieved from the service and intimation that if not so discharged they would go home. Under that order they were dishonorably discharged, and although they served faithfully during the war and for a year thereafter, yet they have borne the disgrace of a dishonorable discharge for now a quarter of a century. It is time that this great wrong to these brave men was redressed by expunging this record and granting them an honorable discharge to date from the muster-out of their regiment.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], is familiar with the case, and, I think, will corroborate what I say. I ask that these men be released from this dishonorable record.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6983) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Twelfth Michigan Volunteer Infantry dishonorably discharged under special orders 92, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, dated March 1, 1866.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cancel as null special orders numbered 92, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, dated March 1, 1866, directing in substance that certain enlisted men belonging to the Twelfth Michigan Volunteer Infantry be dishonorably discharged the service on account of mutinous conduct while with their command in Arkansas, and to cause to be issued to each of the persons therein named an honorable discharge, to have the same force and effect and confer the same rights upon each of said persons, if living, or, in case any of them shall have died, to the respective heirs of such, the same as if such special orders had never been promulgated and executed.

Mr. MILLS. What was the date of this alleged mutinous conduct?

Mr. BURROWS. December, 1865, six or eight months after the war was over.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not object to this bill; but I regret the Committee on Military Affairs have not brought in a general bill granting an honorable discharge to all soldiers who are marked as deserters, but who did not intentionally desert. Many meritorious cases of that kind arise from the fact that many soldiers were compelled to go home on sick furlough, and by reason of illness were not able to report at the expiration of their furloughs. In all such cases where the soldier had no intention to desert his post of duty an honorable discharge should be granted. Only the intentional deserters should be excluded from the operation of such a bill.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] does not object to this bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, sir.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 2357) for the relief of H. H. Faulkner and Mary Woodlee;

An act (H. R. 1982) for the relief of John Fraser; and

An act (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, and for other purposes.

SHIPPING FEES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

Upon an examination of a bill originating in the House of Representatives, No. 4838, entitled "An act to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels, and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, and for other purposes," I find that there is such a failure to adjust existing laws to the new departure proposed by the bill as to greatly endanger the public service if this bill should not be amended or at once supplemented by additional legislation.

The fees which are at present collected from vessels for services performed by the bureau of inspection, and which made up the fund from which certain expenses appurtenant to that bureau were paid, are by the proposed bill abolished; but no provision has been substituted directing that such expenses shall be paid from the public Treasury or any other source.

The objects of the bill are in the main so useful and important that I have concluded to approve the same upon the assurance of those actively promoting its passage that another bill shall at once be introduced to cover the defect above referred to.

The necessity of such supplemental legislation is so obvious that I hope it will receive the immediate action of the Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 19, 1886.

The message was referred to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DINGLEY. By instructions of the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

Mr. HERBERT and others called for the regular order.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is only to supply an omission.

Mr. HERBERT. I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman waive that demand for a moment that I may ask that the Shipping Committee may have leave to report at any time on this subject?

Mr. MORRISON. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order is equivalent to an objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HERBERT. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 109, noes 19.

So (further count not being called for and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

Mr. HERBERT. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. MORROW. This day has been set apart by special order for the consideration of resolutions paying a tribute of respect to the memory of the late Senator MILLER, of California. In view of the fact, however, that it is expected the naval appropriation bill will be concluded during the early part of this day's session, it has been agreed that the resolutions in reference to the late Senator MILLER will be postponed till 3 o'clock, unless the naval appropriation bill shall be sooner concluded.

The motion of Mr. HERBERT was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For provisions for the seamen and marines; commuted rations for officers, naval cadets, seamen, and marines; commuted rations stopped on account of sick in hospital and credited to the hospital fund; water for drinking and cooking purposes on board ships; and for labor and expenses of inspectors, in all $1,160,000; of which the sum of $250,000 shall be paid from the clothing fund and $75,000 from the small-stores fund on hand to the credit of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, and the remainder, to wit, $835,000, is hereby appropriated from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HERBERT. I move to amend, in lines 273 and 274, by striking out "inspector" and substituting "inspection."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HERBERT. I move to amend, in line 274, by striking out "sixty" and substituting "eighty-one;" so that it will read, "in all, one million one hundred and eighty-one thousand."

Also, in line 279, by striking out "eight" and inserting "seven," and striking out "thirty-five" and inserting "fifty-six;" so that the line will read, "remainder, to wit, seven hundred and fifty thousand."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HERBERT. I move to amend, in line 289, by striking out "foremen" and substituting "firemen."

Also, in lines 294 and 295, by striking out "$28,585.24" and inserting in lieu thereof "$35,000."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of professors and others: For two professors, namely, one of mathematics and one of chemistry, at $2,500 each; three professors (assistants), namely, one of physics, one of Spanish and French, and one of English studies, history and law, at $2,200 each; four assistant professors, namely, three of French and one of drawing, at $1,800 each; sword-master, at $1,500, and two assistants, at $1,000 each; boxing-master and gymnast, at $1,200; assistant librarian, at $1,400.

Mr. LORE. I move to amend by striking out, in line 349, the word "chemistry" and inserting the word "physics;" and by striking out, in line 351, the word "physics" and inserting the word "chemistry."

Mr. HERBERT. That correction ought to be made. It was suggested after the estimates were put in and after the bill was framed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of watchmen, mechanics, and others: For captain of the watch and weigher, at $2 50 per day; four watchmen, at $2 per day each; foreman of the gas and steam heating works of academy, at $5 per day; ten attendants at gas and steam heating works, one at $3, one at $2.50, and eight at $2 per day each; four laborers at gas and steam heating works, at $1.50 per day each; one yeoman, $600; one foreman of joiners, one foreman of painters, and one foreman of masons, at $3.50 per day each; one mason, at $3 per day; two joiners and one painter, at $2.50 per day each; one tinner, one gas-fitter, and one blacksmith, at $2.50 per day each; one mechanic at workshop, at $2.25 per day; one master-laborer, to keep public grounds in order, at $2.28 per day; twenty-two laborers, to assist in same, three at $2 per diem each, eleven at $1.50 per diem each, and eight at $1.25 per diem each; one laborer to superintend and keep in order upper quarters of naval cadets, at $2 per diem; twenty servants to keep in order and attend to quarters of naval cadets and public building, at $20 per month each; in all, $42,922.45.

Mr. SMALLS. I move to amend, in line 412, by striking out "twenty" and inserting "twenty-five;" so as to make the pay of these twenty servants $25 a month each.

Mr. Chairman, I find by the Book of Estimates that the Secretary of the Navy recommends the raising of the pay of these servants to $25 a month. There seems to be a considerable distinction made between these and the rest of the laborers employed in the academy. I do not know whether the matter has been brought to the attention of the chairman of the committee, but I find in the estimates this recommendation by the Secretary. The increase being recommended by him, I feel satisfied that it is proper, and it certainly is very much needed, for $20 a month seems to be very small pay. I do not know that the chairman of the committee will have any objection to the amendment.

Mr. HERBERT. That question was called to the attention of the committee and was considered along with several other recommendations of increase of salaries, all of which were refused, with the exception, I believe, of a very small increase in the case of the chemist.

Mr. SMALLS. Will the chairman of the committee please inform us whether there is any law fixing the pay of these servants at $20 a month?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not know of any law fixing it. It is a matter of appropriation. This is the pay these servants have been receiving for years past; it was fixed years ago, when money was worth not more than half as much as it is now. The employés are asking for an increase of wages all along the line at this time, when money is more valuable than it has been for twenty years past, and, after considering the matter, the committee have thought proper to refuse to make any of these increases.

Mr. SMALLS. I will ask the chairman whether this matter has not been brought to the attention of the Secretary by the professors in the academy and whether they have not recommended this increase? It seems quite evident that these servants are just as valuable and render as much service as others who are receiving $1 a day.

Mr. HERBERT. It is true that the professors recommended this increase, as they recommended increases in other cases, but I do not understand that it has been recommended by the Secretary. The gentleman is, of course, aware that these estimates are merely sent in for the consideration of Congress, and that it is for us to determine whether the amounts asked for shall be granted or not. Now, the committee did consider this question, and came to the conclusion that they ought not to raise these wages.

Mr. SMALLS. I hope the chairman will not object to this increase. These servants have very small pay, and the increase is recommended by the professors at the academy. In behalf of these poor men I ask the chairman of the committee to consent to the adoption of the amendment, and I am sure he will do so, for I know he has a liberal heart.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, these servants are getting more wages now than half the laborers in the State which I in part represent, and I think they are getting enough. Further, I say to the gentleman that even if his amendment were adopted it would not accomplish the object he has in view, because it simply increases the aggregate result, not the wages of these special laborers.

Mr. SMALLS. Do I understand the chairman to consent to the amendment?

Mr. HERBERT. I most certainly do not consent to it. I think the House ought to vote it down.

Mr. SMALLS. I hope the House will not do that. I hope it will take into consideration the fact that this is very small pay for these men. They are poor colored men, and inasmuch as the Democratic party proposes to be the leader, the "Moses," of the colored people, I hope our Democratic friends will say on this occasion that these poor men shall have at least $25 a month.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Before the question is taken, I wish the chairman of the committee would explain the difference between the services performed by the "one laborer" provided in line 408, who is "to superintend and keep in order upper quarters of naval cadets," and these servants spoken of by the gentleman from South Carolina, whose duty seems to be almost precisely the same, although in the one case the pay is $2 a day and in the other $20 per month.

Mr. HERBERT. The language of the paragraph indicates the difference. The duty of the one laborer is "to superintend and keep in order," and he has more responsibility. We appropriate here simply the same amount which has been paid heretofore and with which, so far as we know, the employés have been satisfied.

Mr. SMALLS. If there has been anything wrong in the appropriation bill heretofore we ought now to rectify it, especially when some of us are going before the people asking to be re-elected.

Mr. BURROWS. The difference between these employés appears to be that one man who superintends the others and does nothing himself receives $2 a day, while those who do the work get $20 a month.

Mr. HERBERT. Well, the officers in charge seem to think there is reason for the difference, and I doubt not there is. This difference has long existed, and I think it is incumbent upon gentlemen on the other side before urging this amendment to show some reason for a change. I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. BUCK. I have no disposition to take up time; but I am inclined to think the gentleman from South Carolina has some reason for the amendment he has offered. I find in the Book of Estimates this note, which I had not observed before:

These men are obliged to clothe, feed, and lodge themselves, and can not do so on $20 a month.

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask my colleague on the committee [Mr. BUCK] whether in the appropriation bills heretofore passed these laborers have not uniformly received $20 per month?

Mr. BUCK. I do not know how much they have received heretofore; but I know complaint has been made that the wages are altogether too low, a complaint which comes even more from the Department than from the men. This note in the Book of Estimates, sent us for our guidance in making up the amount of wages, says that these men can not feed, clothe, and lodge themselves on $20 a month.

Mr. SAYERS. These laborers are receiving at present 25 or 30 per cent. more than laborers of similar grade in private employ in any State of this Union, especially in the South.

Mr. BUCK. The amendment proposes an increase of only $5 a month in the pay of these men, who, as an official statement declares, can not feed, clothe, and lodge themselves on the amount now paid.

Mr. SAYERS. If they are not satisfied the Government would have no difficulty in filling their places at the present pay.

Mr. BUCK. I think our friends on the other side ought to economize in some other direction rather than here.

A MEMBER. We might strike off the "superintendent."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. SMALLS, there were—ayes 67, noes 60.

Mr. HERBERT. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HERBERT and Mr. SMALLS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 78.

Mr. HERBERT. I will not further insist on a quorum.

So the amendment was agreed to. [Applause on the Republican side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. JOHNSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 1327) authorizing the Court of Claims to hear and determine certain claims, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed, as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. JONES of Arkansas, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 3037) relating to the licensing of vessels engaged in towing to carry persons in addition to to their crew, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. MILLER, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. GORMAN.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of the employés in the department of steam-engineering, Naval Academy: For one master-machinist, at $3.50 per day; one boiler-maker and one pattern-maker, at $3.50 per day each; two machinists and one blacksmith, at $2.50 per day each; four laborers, at $1.50 per day each; in all, $7,668.

Mr. LORE. I move to strike out, in lines 415 and 416, the words "three dollars and fifty cents" and insert "four dollars;" also to amend the aggregate of the paragraph by striking out "$7,668" and inserting "$7,851."

This amendment is designed to correct an error which was made in the original estimates, in which the pay of the master-machinist was inadvertently reduced from $4 to $3.50 per day. The committee inserted in this bill the precise amount of the estimate; but the superintendent of the Naval Academy told me last week that there was a mistake in this particular. This amendment merely corrects that mistake, and continues the wages at the amount heretofore paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a remark. Mr. Chairman, yesterday when the item to appropriate $3,000 to complete the reduction of the observations of the transit of Venus was read I stated I thought that item was covered by the legislative, &c., appropriation bill. I had reference to the appropriation of last year, which was in the following language in the legislative, &c., appropriation bill:

For completing the reduction of the observations of the transit of Venus under the direction of the Transit of Venus Commission, $5,000.

It was then understood that would more than cover the entire expense to be incurred. Large appropriations had been previously made. In the legislative, &c., appropriation bill for the present year provision was made for small contingencies, which we supposed would cover every remaining item. It is for miscellaneous computations $1,200. That was the extent of the estimate as it came to the Committee on Appropriations. I am not able to say, therefore, not having the outside matter before the Committee on Appropriations, whether in this appropriation of $3,000 this item comes in or not.

In addition, I wish to call the attention of my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] having charge of this bill to another fact. Under the heading of Bureau of Steam-Engineering, in lines 336 and 337, I find the following item:

For contingencies, drawing-materials, instruments, &c., for the draughting-room, $500.

Those items seem to belong to the legislative, &c., appropriation bill. In that bill the appropriation is made in the aggregate in the following language:

For stationery, furniture, &c.——

Mr. LORE. What lines does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. HOLMAN. I refer to lines 336 and 337, on page 15 of the naval appropriation bill. The appropriation as made in the aggregate in the legislative, &c., appropriation bill is in the following language:

For stationery, furniture, newspapers, plans, drawings, drawing materials, freight, expressage, postage, and other absolutely necessary expenses for the Navy Department and its various bureaus and officers, $11,000.

I have not been able to examine the extent to which this goes. I am apprehensive my friend in framing this bill without regard to the legislative, &c., has duplicated the appropriations for the same objects. I know duplications will occur under almost any system, but at the same time members of the committee can not be too vigilant in concurring against all such duplications in the appropriations.

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HERBERT. All this is out of order, of course, and I do not understand the exact purpose of the gentleman from Indiana in making the inquiry after we have passed from the paragraph to which he has referred. I call attention to the naval appropriation bill for 1885, which contains this item:

For contingencies, such as instruments and materials for draughting-room, $1,000.

Thus the present estimate is similar to that put in the naval appropriation bill of the preceding year, and it is the same language used in that bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no doubt, as a matter of fact, there is a chance of duplication under any system which may be adopted.

Mr. HERBERT. That is in the present bill, and it is also in the appropriation bill for last year, which was framed by the old committee. I can not see any difference. If there is any duplication it probably occurred last year, unless the gentleman in the legislative, &c. appropriation bill has included an item in the naval appropriation bill. This seems to be here according to precedent. Now, the dividing lines between the different committees are altogether arbitrary. I think it is entirely proper that the different committees having charge of these bills should be careful not to duplicate expenditures. If the gentleman's inquiry has that purpose in view it is proper, and I submit when this committee finds in the naval bill for last year an item precisely the same as that for which an estimate is sent us it is right and proper to insert it. We certainly are not subject to criticism for so doing.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has failed to observe my remarks, that probably duplication will occur under any system of appropriation. It perhaps is inevitable, and results in the main from the way in which estimates are referred to the committee or referred to subcommittees of different committees. In looking over these items I am impressed more than ever before, however distributed, it is of the highest importance to avoid duplication. It is apparent there is duplication here, unintentional duplication of course, and it is likely the same duplication occurred in former years.

Mr. HERBERT. I think, as the gentleman suggests, it is well for all the committees to be on the lookout in this regard.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was my only motive in calling attention to the fact that this was likely to occur.

Mr. BUCK. Is it in order to go back to line 412? I think the chairman of the committee will consent in view of the fact that we passed an amendment raising the pay of these servants to $25 a month, which would increase the aggregate just $100.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the amendment correcting the total has already been made.

Mr. HERBERT. That is right, of course. I suppose that will be done by the Clerk as we proceed with the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For head-stones for the graves of sixty sailors and marines buried in the naval cemetery at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., who lost their lives by being wrecked in the United States steamer Huron, $500.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that there is a general provision in the sundry civil bill covering the whole field of head-stones to mark the graves of soldiers and sailors; and I hope when that bill comes up he will consider it in connection with this item.

Mr. HERBERT. If that be true I presume it would be proper to strike it out here.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, I would not do that. This is an exceptional case; but I think the gentleman should take notice of the fact when we reach the consideration of this item in the bill to which I have referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

For commencing the erection of the new naval observatory and necessary buildings on the site purchased under the act of Congress approved February 4, 1880, $50,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order on that clause until I can make some inquiry, and also offer an amendment, I wish now to make a pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking information.

The inquiry I desire to make is, whether any general plan has been adopted for an observatory, in the first place; and, in the second place, what is meant by the words "and necessary buildings." Does that include separate buildings for the accommodation of the officers connected with this establishment? And, if not, what is included in those words?

Mr. HERBERT. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio I will state that there are no plans that I know of; that is to say, no definite plans were submitted to the committee. This estimate came from the Secretary of the Navy in the form in which it was adopted, and I am unable to answer fully his inquiry.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me then that there should certainly be an amendment to this paragraph. It now opens the door to a very wide expenditure, and I am advised, or have heard it stated at any rate, that it was in contemplation to construct a sort of villa out on the grounds selected for the site of this observatory, to include not only the buildings and necessary offices for the observers and computers, but cottages, fine residences, for the officers in charge and their families—for the professors now engaged at the observatory—and that that plan involves a cost of from $600,000 to $1,000,000.

Mr. BUCK. I would like to ask the gentleman, with his consent——

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman, because information is what I am desirous of getting.

Mr. BUCK. I ask what is the source of the gentleman's information as to the statement that private residences are to be built out there?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is just the information I want to get. I know that is in one of the plans, for I have seen it. It has also been discussed in the public press and has been advocated in connection with the observatory. It has, in fact, been agitated for years that with the erection of the observatory buildings there should also be built residences for the professors and officers of the observatory.

Now, I wish to remark in reference to the observatory building itself, that astronomers are agreed that for the purposes required they want no very costly structure. After the foundation is prepared, which is the important part of the structure, nothing but a mere shell is needed for the purpose of a building. The temperature inside of the building should be as nearly as possible the same as the outside temperature, so that all that is needed for the observatory proper is shell, besides the necessary offices for computers. Indeed, I understand now, notwithstanding the reports, that it is not the wish of the professors in charge of this work that there should be constructed costly buildings for offices or residences, only so far as the needs of the observatory are concerned. The site which has been selected I believe is a very satisfactory and desirable one.

It takes the observatory out of the fogs of the Potomac and puts it in purer air, where observations can be made regularly and satisfactorily.

The construction of the observatory building itself is very desirable; but for the observatory proper and necessary offices the entire cost of construction should not exceed $100,000. I therefore wish to offer this amendment, if the clause is allowed to remain in the bill, to strike out, in line 457, the words "and other buildings," limiting the appropriation strictly to an observatory; then include at the end of line 459 these words:

Provided, That no plan for an observatory, including offices for observers and computers, shall be adopted that will involve an expenditnre of more than $100,000.

That is ample. The best observatory in the world, that built not merely as an observatory, but as a work of art as well, that constructed by the Emperor Nicholas of Russia, only cost about $300,000 with all the necessary buildings. In no observatory in the world has better work been done than recently at our own. But I understand that a new observatory is needed, and the site has already been selected. It is in the equipment that the main cost will come in hereafter, and I hope the committee will accept the amendment, so that we may know what plan we are entering upon.

Mr. HERBERT. I have no authority, of course, in this matter to speak for the committee. But for myself I will say I am in sympathy with the spirit and purpose of the amendment. Perhaps it ought to be modified a little. Certainly I think the gentleman is right in desiring to limit the cost. It may be, however, that some outbuildings are necessary.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will insert in the amendment a provision for offices for computers and for outhouses.

Mr. HERBERT. As I have said, I am willing to accept the amendment, but I have no authority to speak for other members of the committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I ask the gentleman from Alabama whether any plan has been submitted to the committee?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not know of any plan. The plan which the gentleman from Ohio speaks about, which he has seen referred to in the newspapers, I am satisfied is one that simply exists in that way and not in the mind of the Secretary.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I know it is a plan which has been persistently urged by officials of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 457, strike out "and necessary buildings;" and at the end of line 459 insert as follows:

"Provided, That no plan for a naval observatory including offices for observers and computers and necessary outbuildings shall be adopted that will involve an expenditure of more than $100,000.

Mr. ROGERS. Let the paragraph be reported as it will read after it is thus amended.

The Clerk read the paragraph as proposed to be amended.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I ask the chairman of the committee if the full estimate and plan have been submitted to the committee, or are we simply called upon to vote the proposed $50,000 without there being any final estimate for the completion of the observatory?

Mr. HERBERT. I will state to the gentleman that the amendment——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I am not talking about the amendment.

Mr. HERBERT. As I said, no plan at all has been submitted to the committee. The matter is left to the Secretary of the Treasury, and if we pass this proposed amendment it will be left to him to devise the building to be erected, just as in ordinary cases where we appropriate $100,000 for a building according to plans afterwards to be devised.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The Department submitted the estimate which the committee reported?

Mr. HERBERT. The Department submitted the estimate, and we left it to the Department, as is usual in such cases, to devise the plan for the building. I do not know of any case in which a plan for a building, except in the case of the Library, has been submitted to any committee before the bill authorizing the building passed. We have done simply what is usual; we have appropriated so much for a building, leaving the plans to be made by the Department.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That is quite different from the method pursued with public works that I have been connected with on committee. A plan has always accompanied the estimate, and the estimate has been not merely for the commencement of the work but for its final completion. No such plan has been submitted here. I think this is an unusual and unwise way of appropriating money. We do not know what the views of the Department may be. No one here is prepared to say what kind of an observatory the exigencies of the country and of science may require at this time. I think it would be better the whole paragraph were stricken out until we get a complete estimate from the Department. If they want $100,000 for an observatory, I am willing to give that. It is evident that we are asked to act upon this subject when it is not in any state of maturity. There is no well-defined plan. There is no official estimate. I think it would be better to pass over the whole matter until we get some accurate information from the Department. And I shall move at the proper time that the whole paragraph be stricken out. I shall do so in no spirit of unfriendliness to the erection of a suitable observatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas may make the motion he has indicated after the committee has acted on the pending amendment.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I make the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois that it is a change of existing law. We are appropriating for the naval establishment. In this part of the bill we are appropriating for the commencement of a construction which has been authorized by law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I think he can find no law authorizing the erection of the building. There is a law authorizing the purchase of a site.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Perhaps the gentleman will see his correction is unnecessary. There is a law for purchasing a site. There is a law for preparing the plans. There either is or is not a law for commencing the building, it makes no difference to my purpose which. Assume that there is no law now limiting the amount. There is a law that the naval observatory to be built shall not exceed in cost $100,000. This is not an appropriation. It is not a limitation of an appropriation contained in this bill. It is a limitation of all appropriations that shall hereafter be made. It is so indirectly, because it is a limitation on the plan which shall be adopted for that building.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. On that point one word.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, after debate upon the merits of the amendment it is too late to raise the question of order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] submitted an amendment, which was discussed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] and by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], and the Chair thinks it is now too late to make the point of order.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I will remind the Chair that I made the point at the first moment I had an opportunity, because as soon as the amendment was offered the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] was on his feet, and I was reminded by the Chair that he was on his feet. I intended to make the point, and I thought I did make it at the first moment when I could properly do so.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the rule, the time to make the point of order is upon the offering of the amendment, as soon as it is read; but of course a gentleman may rise and state that he reserves the point of order.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. May I ask the Chair what would happen if the gentleman who offered the amendment immediately proceeded to discuss it, as he might do under the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman making the point can take him off his feet by the point of order.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. But is he obliged to do it at that time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so. The Chair thinks that the conduct of business would require that any technical point of that character should be made before discussion of the merits of the proposition.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry in order to get at the legal construction of the amendment. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] whether he intends it to limit the entire expense both of the observatory proper and of the offices of the various employés and officials connected with the observatory, so that the entire structure shall cost only $100,000, or whether he intends to allow the cost of the observatory proper to be governed by the discretion of the Department, limiting only in this way the cost of the other buildings?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The object is to take away unlimited discretion and to limit the expenditure for the observatory and offices for computers—not quarters, not residences—but offices for the observers and computers while at work there, to $100,000.

Mr. BUCK. That is to say, the gentleman understands the amendment to mean that this is to be the limit of the entire expense proposed?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is the idea.

Mr. BUCK. I think, Mr. Chairman, that that would be a very unfortunate limitation, because without proper plans and estimates from the Department it would be impossible for us to know whether it will not be absolutely essential to the completion of the observatory to expend more than $100,000. I must say that I am somewhat in sympathy with the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. Without some plan I certainly would not like to fix a limit in this way. I would much prefer to vote for the bill as it was originally drawn, because we shall certainly have to expend more than $50,000 to accomplish any sort of good.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. As the bill stands now, a plan might be adopted which would cost five millions. There is no limitation whatever.

Mr. BUCK. I have not the least fear of that kind, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure that the fear of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is more technical than real. The idea of constructing private residences there, building a villa, as the gentleman suggests, is absolutely without foundation. I have never before heard the suggestion that it was intended to construct a villa in connection with the Naval Observatory, and I am sure there is no foundation for the idea.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Especially under a reform administration.

Mr. BUCK. Especially under a reform administration, as my friend from Maine suggests.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman will inquire, he will find that the idea of constructing residences has been persistently pressed.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] I apprehend is mistaken about the position of my colleague [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. The very question which he himself puts to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] indicates the unwisdom of embarking in an appropriation of this kind until we have some official information as to what we are to construct. The only information furnished to the House on this subject so far we get from the gentleman from Ohio on my left [Mr. WARNER], and that is totally unofficial. The chairman of the committee who reported this bill is unable to give us any sort of estimate or statistics by which to judge whether we care to undertake this enterprise at all or not. Personally I do not know anything about the necessity or the reasons for it or the expenditure that is contemplated, and the House seems to be precisely in the same position. That, to my mind, is ample reason why this whole provision ought to go out of the bill.

When a question arises here as to an appropriation for a public building, we all understand something about what is required, and we can get official information from various sources as to the necessity for it, the size of the town, the character and amount of the business transacted, and such matters; but here we are left totally in the dark as to how much money is to be expended, as to how it is intended to be expended, and as to what sort of structure we are to have. In short, we are entirely without official data by which we can judge whether we ought to embark in this enterprise at all. Now, sir, I am unwilling to vote for a provision of this kind without having some official information upon which to act understandingly, and I think the proper course to pursue in this case is to strike this whole provision out of the bill until the gentlemen who have the matter in charge are sufficiently interested in it to give Congress some data by which to be guided in making the appropriation. Until that is done, I shall vote against this and every other appropriation looking in this direction.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no doubt in the mind of any one who has looked into this question that a naval observatory adequate to the demands of the service should be erected here. Congress seems to have reached this view as early as 1880, for in that year a law was passed providing for the purchase of a naval observatory site. That law, which I have before me, provided for an appropriation of $75,000 to pay for the site. The site has been purchased, and, as I understand, all of the $75,000 has been expended in that way—perhaps an additional sum. I have no exact information as to how much that site has cost; but the Government has gone to the expense of purchasing a site which has cost at least $75,000, and upon that site a naval observatory building adequate to the demands of that service should be erected. But I think this committee, in advance of any plan submitted showing what the structure is to be and its cost, should not adopt such an amendment as that of the gentleman from Ohio, restricting the cost of the building to $100,000.

Rather than adopt such an amendment I for one would favor the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas, that this whole paragraph be struck out and no provision for the building be made at all until a plan and estimates have been submitted to Congress. We can then see exactly what the building is to be and what it is to cost. But certainly we should not now restrict the cost of this building to $100,000, when we do not know the nature and cost of the building contemplated by those charged with this matter. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will be voted down; and, as I have said, I am disposed to favor the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas, to strike out the paragraph and await the submission to Congress of plans and estimates.

Mr. REAGAN. I concur with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] in his dissent from the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and I favor the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas. It seems to me unwise to enter upon the construction of a naval observatory in advance of the submission of plans and estimates to Congress. We all know what such a step means. When you give a Department a carte blanche in that respect it adopts whatever plan it pleases. I think it will be best to strike out the entire paragraph until proper plans and estimates shall have been submitted to Congress. It is not best for us to delegate to any Department of the Government the power of determining what expenditures there shall be of the money of the people.

Mr. BUCK. I think there is a misconception on the part of some gentlemen here in regard to the matter of the plans for this naval observatory. In the report of the superintendent of the observatory I find it stated that plans have been prepared for a long time, have received the approval of prominent scientific men, and the work can be begun as soon as the money is forthcoming. It also appears by this report that were the funds now in hand it would take fully three years to erect the new building, transfer the plant, and get everything into working order. It will be seen that everything is in readiness to go on with the building provided the money be appropriated.

I take the liberty of bringing to the attention of gentlemen two paragraphs from the report of the superintendent:

> The sum asked for the new observatory ($586,138) is intended to cover all expenses of putting the establishment, on its removal, in perfect working condition in every way. It includes the erection of the observatory buildings proper, quarters for the superintendent, the observers, and others whose attendance is necessary at all times, especially during the night; the removal and remounting of the instruments, construction of roads, grading and fencing, and other details of like character.
> Plans for the proposed building were prepared in 1881 under the supervision of the then superintendent, the late Rear-Admiral John Rodgers, United States Navy. After completion they were submitted to some of the leading scientists of the country for examination, and, receiving their approval, were adopted by the commission authorized by Congress to take cognizance of the matter. They are believed to be in the main all that is desirable.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Has the gentleman the plans before him?

Mr. BUCK. I have never seen the plans, nor do I know what expense they contemplate in the aggregate. It is clear, however, from the report of the superintendent that the plans are all matured.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is there any member of the committee who can inform the House what the plans are and what is the aggregate of the estimated expense?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. In the appendix of the last Book of Estimates, page 279, we find that the estimate for the total completion of this building is $586,138. That has nothing to do with the buying of instruments, which, as gentlemen know, is often the most expensive part of an observatory. This estimate embraces officers' quarters and everything of that sort. I presume it embraces quite a number of buildings rather than a single building. Now it may be demonstrable that all this is necessary; but as yet no attempt has been made to demonstrate it, and there is a decided difference of opinion on the subject.

I find by reference to page 162 that the estimate for commencing the work is $250,000. I think we had better omit any appropriation of this kind for the present, as has been done in past years.

Mr. Chairman, is it in order for me to move to strike out the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment now pending which, in the opinion of the Chair, should be first voted upon.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, for my part I favor an appropriation for commencing the observatory proper. I withdraw the amendment I have already offered, and substitute what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 457, the words "and necessary buildings."
After the word "dollars," in line 459, add the following:
"Provided, That the construction of no building shall be commenced except an observatory proper, with necessary offices for observers and computers."

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is all right.

Mr. BUCK. Does that amendment limit the amount at all?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It does not.

Mr. BUCK. Does it provide for striking out, in line 457, the words "and necessary buildings?" If those words are left in, I think the amendment is proper enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment strikes out those words.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is not necessary now to provide for any outbuildings. If they should be required they can be appropriated for a year or two hence. It will not take long to construct them.

Mr. BUCK. If the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is to prevail it simply limits the character of the structure without limiting the amount it may cost.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is all.

Mr. BUCK. Now, it seems to me that as it may turn out that other buildings are necessary in connection with the observatory proper, it would be entirely judicious to leave that question to the discretion of those who may have charge of this matter.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They can be provided for hereafter. They will take but a short time to build.

Mr. BUCK. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio I think there is much sense in his amendment. But in reply to a question he asked me a moment ago I will say these plans will require an expenditure of $586,138.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will move to strike out the whole paragraph as soon as the amendment has been voted on.

Mr. BLANCHARD. At first I supposed plans for the construction of the naval observatory had not been submitted or adopted. I understand now such plans have been long since submitted and adopted. I will read from the appendix, to which we were referred by the gentleman from Arkansas, the following letter:

UNITED STATES NAVAL OBSERVATORY,
Washington, September 18, 1885.

SIR: No appropriation having been made for the erection of a new naval observatory upon the site purchased therefor under the act approved February 4, 1880, I have the honor to renew the estimate which was submitted by my predecessors in 1882, 1883, and 1884, and beg to request that it may be again submitted to Congress with the approval of the Department.

In anticipation of removal to the new site, no money of any moment has been expended at the present location for repairs and improvements for several years. As a consequence thereof, the buildings and appurtenances are fast getting into a dilapidated condition hardly creditable to a national institution of such prominence and character; and unless Congress, in its wisdom, sees fit to grant the money, or a part of it, submitted in the estimate for the proposed new structures, then it is urged that a reasonable sum be appropriated for the purpose of improving the condition of things here at the old point.

The sum asked for the new observatory ($586,138) is intended to cover all expenses of putting the establishment, on its removal, in perfect working condition in every way. It includes the erection of the observatory buildings proper, quarters for the superintendent, the observers, and others whose attendance is necessary at all times, especially during the night; the removal and remounting of the instruments, construction of roads, grading and fencing, and other details of like character.

Plans for the proposed building were prepared in 1881 under the supervision of the then superintendent, the late Rear-Admiral John Rodgers, United States Navy. After completion, they were submitted to some of the leading scientists of the country for examination, and, receiving their approval, were adopted by the commission authorized by Congress to take cognizance of the matter. They are believed to be in the main all that is desirable.

The present location is unhealthy in the extreme, and those who are called upon for night service suffer more or less from malaria a good part of the time. Fogs also, gathering over the Potomac at certain seasons of the year, frequently obstruct the observers, and many desired opportunities for astronomical work are lost in consequence. On the other hand, the terrene surroundings and influences and atmospheric conditions at the new site are very salubrious and favorable, and it is to be hoped that Congress will give such facts careful consideration when the estimate in question is laid before it.

I also submit, in connection with this subject, a communication from the late Supervising Architect of the Treasury to the Committee on Appropriations of House of Representatives in 1882.

Very respectfully,

GEO. E. BELKNAP,
Commodore, U. S. N., Superintendent.

Capt. J. G. WALKER, U. S. N.,
Chief of Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department.

So it will be seen by this statement these plans, submitted in 1881, have been adopted by the commission appointed by Congress for the purpose. If that is the case, it seems the part of wisdom Congress should now make appropriation for the purpose of commencing the erection of the naval observatory. I do not think either the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] or the one of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] should be adopted, but the report of the committee on this subject appropriating $500,000 for the commencement of this building should prevail.

Mr. REAGAN. Without putting any limitation to it at all?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The plan as submitted for five hundred and odd thousand dollars will complete the whole thing.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio.

Mr. BLANCHARD called for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 6.

Mr. BLANCHARD. No quorum has voted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his call for a quorum. It is evident the amendment is going to carry.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I withdraw the call for a quorum.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move to strike out the paragraph as amended.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates: For 1 sergeant-major, 1 quartermaster-sergeant, 1 leader of the band, 1 drum-major, 50 first sergeants, 140 sergeants, 180 corporals, 30 musicians, 96 drummers and fifers, and 1,500 privates, $255,052.

Mr. HERBERT. I move, on the part of the committee, to insert after the word "dollars," in line 479, the following:

But the further sum of $200,000 of the surplus fund now standing to the credit of the pay of the Marine Corps is hereby appropriated and made available for that purpose during the fiscal year 1887.

I explained, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the first item of pay of the Navy, a new ruling in the Treasury Department, rendered necessary this reappropriation. The same circumstances apply here, and for the same reason this amendment was rendered necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs of barracks at Portsmouth, N. H.; Boston, Mass.; Brooklyn, N. Y.; League Island, Pennsylvania; Annapolis, Md.; headquarters and navy-yards, Washington, D. C.; Gosport, Va.; and Mare Island, California, $9,000; for the erection of a building for marine barracks at navy-yard Pensacola, Fla., to take the place of one destroyed on account of yellow fever (appropriation to be immediately available), $2,000; placing tin roof on marine barracks and officers' quarters at Washington, D. C., $1,200; rent of building used for manufacture of clothing, stowing supplies, and offices of assistant quartermasters, Philadelphia, Pa., and San Francisco, Cal., $2,260; in all, $14,460.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to this paragraph of the bill, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after the word "dollars," in line 514, "for the erection of officers' quarters at the marine barracks, Mare Island navy-yard, California, $15,000." In line 520, strike out "fourteen" and insert "twenty-nine."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The point of order should be reserved on the amendment.

Mr. HERBERT. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy. I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting the subject to Congress; also a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, and another letter from an officer who was sent to examine into the necessity of this improvement, addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 17, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of letter of the Secretary of the Navy of the 15th instant, submitting estimates of appropriations for the following objects: Erection of three cottages for officers' quarters at marine barracks, navy-yard, Mare Island, California, $15,000; repair of barracks, outbuildings, and parade-ground, navy-yard, Mare Island, California, $5,000.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary.

The honorable SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., June 15, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication dated the 7th instant, addressed to me by Maj. H. B. Lowry, quartermaster of the Marine Corps, accompanied by an estimate of $20,000; $15,000 of that sum being for the erection of three cottages for officers' quarters at the marine barracks, navy-yard, Mare Island, and $5,000 for the repairs of barracks, outbuildings, and parade-ground at that post, and have to request that the same may be submitted to Congress. The Department approves of this estimate and recommends that it receive favorable action. Both the officers' quarters and the repairs suggested are objects of immediate necessity.

Very respectfully,

W. C. WHITNEY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS, QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1886.

SIR: I herewith respectfully inclose estimates for the erection of three cottages, to be used as officers' quarters at the Marine Barracks, navy-yard, Mare Island, California, and an estimate of $5,000 to be used in repair of barracks, outbuildings, and parade ground at the same post.

In this connection I would state that the marine barracks referred to were erected in 1863 at a cost of $139,058.44.

The original plans, embracing four cottages, one in use by the commanding marine officer, was erected in 1870.

The officers doing duty are now quartered in barracks with the enlisted men, a condition of affairs that produces discomfort, discontent, and trouble.

Every naval officer on duty at the yard has his house; even the teamster is located in a separate cottage. This distinction ought not to exist, and I sincerely hope that in justice to the marine officers now on duty in California, separated as they are from the East, and in so isolated a place as the navy-yard is, that these estimates may be submitted to Congress with the approval of the honorable Secretary of the Navy.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. B. LOWRY,
Major and Quartermaster, U. S. M. C.

Hon. W. C. WHITNEY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. McKENNA. The estimates in obedience to that have been ascertained and amount to $15,000.

Now, I know how reluctant the House is to add any amendment to the appropriation bills as they come from the committees. But if the members of the House have attended to the reading of that letter they will see that Major Lowry went to California in obedience to the orders of the Secretary of the Navy, made on May 8, 1886, and has only just made his report as to the condition of the barracks and the necessities for these quarters.

Had that report come in at an earlier date, in time to have been referred in the estimates to the Naval Committee, I have no doubt, sir, that they would have considered the recommendation and made an appropriation of at least that percentage of the estimate which is usually made for work which is thus recommended.

It is true that the quarters are occupied by the officers at present, and in which they have resided for some time, but it is none the less true that the original estimate included the erection of these quarters in order that there might be some separation between the officers and men on duty at that point.

It is very essential that this work should be done, and I hope the amendment will receive the approbation of the committee.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, the points of order against this amendment are two. The amendment provides in the first place for the erection of a building at the point designated, and the gentleman has pointed out no statute authorizing the erection of such new building. The next point is that this provision would properly go into the sundry civil bill, where the public buildings are provided for and does not properly belong to this bill.

Mr. McKENNA. Will the gentleman allow me to say that I consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who told me, if I am not disclosing a matter I should not, that the Naval Committee was the proper committee and had jurisdiction of this subject.

Mr. RANDALL. I said to you that I was not in favor of this appropriation.

Mr. McKENNA. You undoubtedly did. I have not said that you were.

Mr. RANDALL. And that I never would consent that it should go on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. McKENNA. But did you not tell me what I have just stated?

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I turned you over to the Naval Committee with the understanding that I was not in favor of making the appropriation.

Mr. McKENNA. I do not, of course, know what your understanding was, but I know what you said.

Mr. RANDALL. Do you mean to say that I said anything different to you personally from what I now say?

Mr. McKENNA. I say that you said to me personally just exactly what I said a little while ago.

Mr. RANDALL. What was it?

Mr. McKENNA. You also said to me that you were not in favor of putting on the bill which you designated, I do not now remember the name, any provision of this kind, not being in favor of building quarters for officers.

But I understood you to say this matter was for the Naval Committee, and that the proper place was on this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I said, if the gentleman will recollect, that I did not think appropriations in connection with the Navy had a proper place in the sundry civil bill, and I alluded to your California drydock, and said because it was for the completion of that work we inserted the appropriation in the sundry civil bill; but I deny I ever in any way gave you the least encouragement to believe I would support this proposition.

Mr. McKENNA. Have I said so, or anything like that?

Mr. RANDALL. I may have misunderstood the gentleman. I do not want to put any other other construction on his language than what he intended.

Mr. HERBERT. I insist on the point of order. The estimates on which the gentleman from California [Mr. McKENNA] relies were referred by the Speaker to the Appropriations Committee. That was a decision by the Speaker himself, that that committee had jurisdiction, and that the Naval Committee had no jurisdiction of that subject-matter. Both of those points of order were good.

Mr. HENLEY. I see, however, that the gentleman from Alabama deals with cognate improvements in this bill. Here is an appropriation for the erection of marine barracks at various navy-yards.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman is mistaken. There is no appropriation for the erection of a marine barracks anywhere, except one for a building which was burned down at a place where marine barracks were already established by law. There is no precedent in that.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RICHARDSON took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. JOHNSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 392) declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads; and

A bill (H. R. 5866) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Knoxville, Tenn.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 2148) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a building for the United States circuit and district courts of the United States, the post-office, and other Government offices at Williamsport, Pa.," and making an additional appropriation therefor, requested a conference, and had appointed Mr. MAHONE, Mr. CAMERON, and Mr. CAMDEN the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 4498) authorizing an additional appropriation of $25,000 for the court-house at Keokuk, Iowa, to make the same fire-proof, requested a committee of conference, and had appointed Mr. MAHONE, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. VEST the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 5179) to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, requested a committee of conference, and had appointed Mr. HARRISON, Mr. MANDERSON, and Mr. BUTLER the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 5890) for the relief of Grafton Monroe, requested a conference, and had appointed Mr. MAXEY, Mr. CONGER, and Mr. CHACE conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. 6311) granting arrears of pensions to Mrs. Maria Walker, requested a conference, and had appointed Mr. BLAIR, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. WILSON of Maryland conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understand him to make the point that this proposed amendment is not germane to this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not make that point.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is a paragraph of this bill which relates to the repairs of the barracks, to the erection of a building for marine barracks at the navy-yard, Pensacola, Fla., and to various cognate subjects.

Mr. HERBERT. I did not make the point that the amendment was not germane. The point I made was this: The Naval Committee and every other committee of this House has jurisdiction only over the matters confided to it by the rules. When the present rules were framed the Naval Committee was given jurisdiction over the ordinary appropriations for the naval service. That is to say, the regular annual appropriation bill for the Navy rightfully contains just exactly such matters as it has contained heretofore. There is no other way of construing the rule of the House, which gives us jurisdiction over that matter and leaves with the regular Appropriations Committee such jurisdiction as is not taken away from it. We must go to these bills as they existed heretofore and find out what they contained. The line between these different bills, as I have had occasion to say once before during the progress of this bill, is very arbitrary and in many cases I can see no reason for it. Yet it exists. And when we undertake to decide what we have jurisdiction over and what the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction over, there is no way of getting at it except by looking at the bills of past Congresses. When we look at these we find that appropriations for public buildings belong to the sundry civil bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman question the jurisdiction of the Naval Committee over the subject-matter of the repairs of barracks or the erection of buildings for marine purposes at navy-yards? I ask the question because those very items are incorporated in this bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not question the jurisdiction of the Naval Committee over repairs; but I do as regards the erection of buildings. That is an illustration of what I have just said.

Mr. BOUTELLE. This very bill contains a provision for the erection of a naval observatory.

Mr. HERBERT. Exactly so; and if the point of order against that provision had been insisted upon it would have been sustained.

I want to state further to my colleague that it was understood by the members of our committee—at least by those who were present when this question of the Naval Observatory was considered—that the observatory would be ruled out on a point of order if the point were made; but, as we thought it ought to be erected, we put the provision into the bill to take its chances, and it seems to have run the gauntlet. That, however, does not show that the point of order might not have been made against it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the House ought to understand this question, which appears to me to be a perfectly simple one. The bill which I hold in my hand, reported by the Naval Committee, contains provisions for the repair of marine barracks at Portsmouth, N. H., at Boston, at Brooklyn, and at other places, and for the erection of a building for marine barracks at the navy-yard at Pensacola, to take the place of the one destroyed on account of the yellow fever. It is now proposed to amend the bill by making an appropriation for additional buildings, structures of precisely the same nature, for precisely the same purposes, at the Mare Island navy-yard; and it does seem to me that if the subject-matter of this amendment is not in order on this bill, then none of these provisions to which I have referred have a right to a place in the bill. If, on the other hand, the Naval Committee had jurisdiction—and I can not conceive of any Representative doubting that it had and must have had jurisdiction over appropriations for marine barracks and for officers' quarters at marine barracks—so that they were justified in bringing in the appropriations which they have reported here, then the amendment proposing to extend the operation of this paragraph so as to provide for the construction of other buildings at the navy-yard in California is certainly legitimate and must be in order.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there can be no point of order raised upon this proposition as a matter of new legislation, because the navy-yards of the United States are established by law.

The naval establishments at the various yards have been provided for by law, and it is certainly competent for Congress under existing law to make appropriations for keeping up those establishments which have been regularly provided for by statute.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, with regard to the point of order that this is not a proper place for this appropriation I shall say nothing. It is new to me, and it strikes me as unsound. I desire to speak of the other point of order, namely, that these buildings, as the gentleman from Alabama has said, are not authorized by law. It makes not the slightest difference in the world, under our rules, whether these three buildings have been previously authorized by law or not, for the appropriation, however unauthorized by law, is in continuation of a work already in progress. Now I am informed as a matter of fact that some years ago, when the first building was erected, there was an estimate for five buildings and an appropriation to commence the erection of them. One of them was built, and afterward another was built, but these three are yet uncompleted; and, under any reasonable construction of our rule, it seems to me clear that, whether previously authorized by law or not, this is "in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress." The matter of fact I get from the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA], who proposed the amendment. I know nothing of it personally.

Mr. HERBERT. In conclusion, I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that there may have been some such law, but I have never seen it and I demand its production, because unless we see it we can not tell whether it authorizes such a building as that or not. But both these points of order, it seems to me, are perfectly good. One is that this is not a matter confided to us by the rules of the House. It might have been, but it was not. The rules are to be judged by the appropriation bills as they existed at the time the rules were adopted, and looking at them it is very clear that the erection of new buildings belongs to the sundry civil bill and not to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Yet you have in this bill an item for the erection of a new building for the marine barracks at Pensacola.

Mr. HERBERT. I have already explained that that is to take the place of one that was burned down.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How does that alter the case?

Mr. HERBERT. Because that was established by law, and therefore there was an existing law for the appropriation.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand the gentleman to hold that it requires a special law to provide for the erection of marine barracks in a navy-yard?

Mr. HERBERT. This is not a provision for marine barracks.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand the chairman to make a distinction between the provision of law that would be required for the erection of marine barracks and the provision that would be required for the erection of officers' quarters?

Mr. HERBERT. Not at all. If there were no marine barracks there, it would require a law to authorize their construction. There being no officers' quarters, it requires a law to authorize the building of them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I take issue with the chairman on that point.

Mr. HERBERT. It is a question for the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to decide.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me to be a most extraordinary position to take, that you can make an appropriation for the construction of a building to take the place of one destroyed by fire, and yet that you can not make provision for the necessary officers' quarters, they being naval officers and this being a naval post. It does seem to me very extraordinary that the Committee on Naval Affairs should bring in here a recommendation for the construction of a new building, trusting to the indulgence of the House that the point of order would not be made against it, and yet that when an amendment is urged which is necessary for the public service the committee should themselves raise the point of order to prevent that amendment being adopted.

Now who knows whether this building is necessary? Do we? Has the chairman of the Naval Committee been there to inspect? No, sir. Has he ever seen the place at all? No, sir. Whose duty is it to ascertain the facts in these matters and suggest the remedy for any defect? Necessarily it is the duty of the Secretary of the Navy. In the discharge of his duty he sent an officer out there on the 8th of May with direct orders to investigate the condition of these barracks. The report comes that they are in bad condition and need repairs. The report comes that officers are now mingled with the men, much to their discomfort and to the detriment of discipline.

Mr. HERBERT. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that we did give an increased appropriation covering the repair of the barracks he is talking about.

Mr. MCKENNA. How much?

Mr. HERBERT. It was the estimate of the Quartermaster-General that out of what we appropriate he could apply $1,500 to the repair of barracks.

Mr. MCKENNA. Let me show you how much of an increase this is. The estimate for the purposes here enumerated in the bill is $15,000, and the bill appropriates $9,000—a very magnificent increase!

Mr. HERBERT. I meant an increase over the bill of last year, not over the estimate.

Mr. MCKENNA. Now, Mr. Chairman, this recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy embraces $5,000 for repair of barracks. In deference to what the chairman of the committee has told me in regard to the testimony given before the committee, I entirely omitted that item from my amendment, and confined it to the recommendation for the erection of officers' quarters. Is not this a necessary service? What should be the test of appropriations if not the necessity of the service? What is the business of a committee of this House charged with appropriations for public purposes if it is not to provide adequately for necessary service; and when such a committee does not do this, is it not derelict in its duty?

I know the reluctance to grant appropriations, and to some extent I sympathize with it; but when this reluctance goes so far as to withhold adequate appropriations for necessary service, it becomes detrimental to the public business and a neglect of public duty. I think this House should make the appropriation asked for by the Secretary of the Navy, who is supposed to know the needs of the service in these cases, who has informed himself in this matter, and who recommends this appropriation as urgent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that under the rules the Committee on Naval Affairs, in reporting a bill of this character, has no authority to include a provision for the construction of new public buildings; and when a point of order is made upon such a provision the Chair is of opinion that it must be sustained. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, we are now through with the consideration of the various items of this bill. I desire now to state the aggregate amount of appropriations embraced in the bill after taking into account the changes which have been made during its consideration. I stated the other day that the bill appropriated $11,839,972.70; and for the current year the appropriations were $15,029,704.95. It has been claimed that a decrease has been made upon the appropriations of last year to the extent of $3,189,732.25.

Now, there are certain items which were estimated for and might have been put in this bill, and which are authorized by existing law, but which, or a part of which at least, have been placed in the "new-ship bill." The rest of them have in the course of the consideration of the present bill been reappropriated to be used during the next fiscal year, as in my remarks in the general debate on this bill I predicted would be the case. I will simply state those items which are to be taken into consideration when we compare this bill with the bill of last year. The first is for the increase of the Navy, provided for by the act of March 3, 1885, and the amount is $1,895,000, which has not been used. The remaining items are balance on "pay of the Navy," which has been reappropriated by the vote of yesterday, $576,308.24; surplus in Marine Corps, $200,000; surplus in clothing, $250,000; small stores, $75,000; improvement and plans of navy-yards, $250,000; for manufacture of torpedoes, $125,000; and for armament of vessels authorized by act of March 3, 1885, for the monitors and for the Miantonomoh, $500,000. That is an estimate, being one-half of the $1,000,000 appropriated for the above purpose and also for the armament of the vessels provided for in the new-ship bill, which is certainly a very fair estimate. It will be seen that the item for armament of the vessels provided for in the new-ship bill could not have been put into this appropriation bill, for they are not yet authorized by law, but the other items could have been put in, for they are authorized by existing law.

These sums which I have named should, therefore, be added to the bill we have reported this year, they being items which come from the "new-ship bill." Those items amount in all to $3,871,300.24, which, added to the bill as originally reported, makes $15,711,272.94.

Now, subtracting from this amount the appropriations of last year, we have $681,576.99 as the legitimate increase of appropriations over those of last year, without taking into account the additions or subtractions made during the consideration of the bill. We have added exactly $4,414.76. We have taken from the bill $79,000.

These figures I have from the Clerk, and they correspond with my own memorandum, making the actual increase of appropriations over and above the appropriations of last year $606,982.78.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that the appropriation for the armament of the ships authorized by the act of March 3, 1885, is not included in this, but in another bill, together with a number of items for torpedoes, &c.

Mr. BUCK. That is the fact.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose that the "new-ship bill," as it is called, should not pass, what then?

Mr. BUCK. Then there will be no provision for the manufacture of torpedoes, no provision for the armament of the monitors or the Miantonomoh or the vessels authorized by the act of March 3, 1885.

Mr. CANNON. I ask my friend, and also members of his committee on the majority side, whether it is not an open secret that the leaders on that side have decreed that the "new-ship bill," reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, shall not and will not pass at this session of Congress?

Mr. BUCK. I am unable to say what their purpose may be, but it is our purpose to urge the passage of that bill. If it should not pass, these various items will, of course, fail.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am much obliged to my colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK], for recurring to this subject, because I think his statements made the other day, and which he now repeats, should be answered. I was astonished at him then, as I am now, undertaking on the floor of the House to explain away the work he did in committee and which he aided us in doing. I repeat, I am astonished at his efforts to show that we have not been economical, when all the time he stood by us in all our efforts to reduce, as we did successfully, not only the amount of money taken out of the Treasury but the money altogether—surplus funds and everything else. The appropriation for the increase of the Navy left out of this bill and in the bill of last year put together would show we have reduced expenditures by a sum of nearly $300,000.

The true statement of the amounts involved in the present bill is as follows:

In bill as reported, not counting surplus funds utilized		$11,849,858 70
Deduct amount subtracted by amendment for "provisions"		79,000,00
Making		11,770,858 70
Increased by amount of amendment "civil establishment," "provisions and clothing"	$4,414 76
And amount amendment for increased pay of laborers at Naval Academy	1,200 00
		$5,614 76
Total in bill as amended, excluding surplus funds utilized		11,776,473 46
Reappropriated:
"Pay of the Navy"	$576,380 24
"Clothing and small stores"	325,000 00
"Pay of Marine Corps"	200,000 00
		1,101,380 24
		12,877,853 70

The total amount included in the bill therefore is $12,877,853.70, as against an appropriation for the preceding year of $15,029,704.80, making a difference of $2,151,651.10. From this it is fair to deduct the amount in bill of last year for "increase of Navy," $1,895,000; making a difference of $256,651.10.

Strangely enough my colleague undertakes to cipher away this sum by selecting certain items estimated for in the Bureau of Ordnance and not included in our bill. His whole argument on this point is disposed of by the simple statement that last year's bill appropriated $229,000 to the Bureau of Ordnance and the present bill appropriates $228,204 to this same bureau. I believe he also said something about items estimated for in the Bureau of Yards and Docks. To this bureau the appropriation for the year 1885–'86 was $244,000, whereas we give that same bureau in this bill $272,000. Our reductions have been in "Pay of the Navy," "Pay miscellaneous," steam-engineering in the civil establishments of all the bureaus and elsewhere.

I submit that my colleague on the committee ought not to attempt to explain away the good work he has helped to accomplish. He ought to join with me in contending before the country that we have not only utilized surplus appropriations made by previous Congresses and thus taken away from those who control them the temptation to waste money, but that we have also increased appropriations wherever it was necessary to prevent a deficiency in the coming fiscal year.

Our appropriation for a new Naval Observatory (not included in the act of the last Congress) I might call attention to if this $50,000 be taken into consideration. Then the difference in the two bills would be not $256,651.10 but $306,651.10.

The gentleman has been comparing our bill not with the act of last Congress but with estimates.

Mr. BUCK. In my remarks I have drawn no comparison between the estimates, but only between the bill of last year and the bill of this year.

Mr. HERBERT. I beg pardon of my colleague on the committee, but he spoke of the estimates for torpedoes.

Mr. BUCK. I alluded to the estimates for torpedoes for the purpose of showing the estimates for the manufacture of torpedoes had been made and based on those estimates we made appropriation for the purpose which was put into this appropriation bill.

Mr. HERBERT. Your argument can not be sustained on any other idea than that of comparing the figures in our bill with the estimates.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Allow me to suggest——

Mr. HERBERT. I can not yield.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to suggest——

Mr. HERBERT. If the gentleman will allow me I will go on with my remarks.

Mr. GOFF. I raise the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the bill has been finished and there is nothing before the committee on which discussion can be had. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. HERBERT. I have the floor, and I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the gentleman does not wish to be corrected I hope he will confine himself within the range of facts.

Mr. HERBERT. I will stop for a correction.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My correction is this (cries of "Order!"): The point the gentleman from Connecticut was making was that instead of a decrease this bill is an increase on the bill of last year.

Mr. HERBERT. That is where we differ, and I am trying to show that it is not.

Mr. GOFF. Has not a point of order been raised that there is nothing before the House for discussion?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. I have not been present during the time this bill was under consideration. If I understand correctly there is no appropriation in this bill for armament of ships the construction of which has been authorized, nor for torpedoes, but that those are recommended in another bill coming from the same Committee on Naval Affairs.

Now, suppose that bill does not pass; what is to become of this service?

Mr. HERBERT. I want to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois; that is to say, the question as to whether or not we expect to pass the ship bill. I reply to him I think we will. The gentleman says he understands it has gone forth from the leaders of this side of the House that it will not pass. I think that is a mistake. From my conversation with certain leading gentlemen on this side I am satisfied the bill will pass, and hope I am not mistaken.

Mr. CANNON. But does my friend from Alabama think it good policy in legislation that this appropriation bill, which must pass, providing for this branch of the public service, should be permitted to pass without containing these important items for the public service, but rather permit them to go upon a bill which may, and I believe will, fail to pass?

Mr. HERBERT. I think it is good policy to do just what we are doing and pass the bill in its present form.

I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. GOFF. I hope the gentleman will not do that; I want to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. HERBERT. Certainly, if the gentleman wants to amend the bill I will withdraw that motion.

Mr. GOFF. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. For the completion of the double-turreted monitors Puritan, Amphitrite, Monadnock, and Terror, the sum of $3,178,046 is hereby appropriated, distributed as follows:

For the completion of the Puritan, $969,232.

For the completion of the Amphitrite, $651,084.

For the completion of the Monadnock, and for the construction of engines for said vessel, $918,942.

For the completion of the Terror, $638,788.

Mr. HERBERT. I make the point of order upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HERBERT. That is not germane to this portion of the bill. We have already passed the portion of the bill where it could properly be inserted.

Mr. GOFF. But I offer it as an independent section—an additional section to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, as I stated on yesterday, there is no appropriation contained in this bill for the completion of these double-turreted monitors; and as I think if the attention of this House is directed to this matter they will, while they still have an opportunity, insert a provision in the proper place for the completion of these vessels, I should be derelict in my duty if I did not give them that opportunity.

Now, I asserted on yesterday, and invited contradiction if it was not true, that these vessels were to-day concededly the best vessels of their types known to naval architecture. I said on yesterday that the Secretary of the Navy in his testimony before the Committee on Naval Affairs commended these ships to the consideration of the committee and the country, and I propose now to ask the attention of the House to his testimony. He says, and I quote from page 62 of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in response to this question:

Give us your opinion as to whether this Congress ought to appropriate money to complete these monitors.

Answer. It would be my opinion that they ought. It was not my opinion originally when I first began to think about it. I think there has been considerable prejudice against these ships. They have been taken up piecemeal and carried on by little contracts and drawn on through a great many years, and I don't think perhaps in a business-like way. I think there is some prejudice against them from that. When you think what we have spent on those ships——

Here he was interrupted by another question as to his opinion of these ships, and replied:

I suppose they would be quite formidable vessels.

And such is the drift of his testimony.

Now I turn to the testimony of Admiral Porter, which will be found on page 71, in which he states that they are most excellent ships, and that there have been a great many misrepresentations made about them. He says:

I have had them all examined by boards under my direction at different times, and I have examined the Miantonomoh, which is about the same as the rest, although they are quite different from the original ships; the original ships were very good ships in the history of our country. They were the most powerful in the world. These have more speed.

Now I do not want to take up the time of the committee or my own limited time going on with this testimony——

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. GOFF. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. When were these ships commenced?

Mr. GOFF. In 1874.

As Secretary Whitney says, only very insignificant appropriations have been made toward their completion. Whenever an effort was made to complete them it was always met on the other side with a laugh on the floor of the House. We were told that the ships would not float if ever they were completed; and we struggled here term after term, Congress after Congress, in the vain effort, as history shows, to complete these vessels.

Now, it is conceded by the Secretary of the Navy and all the officers of the Navy who have examined the question that these ships, if completed, will be most powerful vessels of war and useful to this country. We have no coast defenses to-day, and this double-turreted monitor system of coast defenses is the best known in the world. This is the best information obtained from the officers who have examined the ships, and the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Whitney, also indorses that opinion. The foreign governments who have heretofore abandoned this system are again coming back to it.

Why should we not complete them? Why should not the appropriation be made upon this bill? It is the proper bill for this purpose. These are not new vessels. The bill to increase the efficiency of the Navy and the vessels therein provided for refers to new ships; but this is a provision to complete vessels now in progress of construction. The figures I have sent to the desk in the amendment are the identical amounts suggested by the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Whitney, himself, who has recommended the completion of the ships. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has incorporated it into this other bill to which he alludes, but as to which there is doubt of its passage. There is no doubt of the passage of this one; and why should my friends on the other side of the House hesitate to place in the hands of a Democratic administration the money to complete the vessels and give the beginning of a new Navy? Do you discredit your own Secretary, or dread your own administration?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. My colleague from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] seems to be very much disturbed by the action of the Democratic party in relation to the Navy of this country. From 1865 the party he represents has been in charge of the legislative department of this Government, the purse of the Government, and the executive portion of the Government.

Mr. GOFF. Does the gentleman say the Republican party during that time has had charge of the legislative department of the Government?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. There has been from that time until this administration no law that has passed both branches of Congress that has not had to be approved or vetoed by a Republican President. There has been no law passed that it was not necessary for a Republican Executive to put into force or to withhold. And we have had under one of the Republican Presidents the action of the party refusing to use money that had been appropriated for public purposes.

Now, if this country is without a navy to-day it is useless for my colleague to charge that the Democratic party is responsible for it. If these boats have not been completed they had an opportunity to complete them, and the money that has been appropriated by the Congress of the United States—in all, $400,000,000—has been wasted and expended, and not a solitary ship worthy of note has been built during that time.

Mr. GOFF. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOFF. When was an appropriation made for the construction of ships the expenditure of which a Republican administration had charge of?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will answer my colleague by saying that during all this time they have not made an appropriation to build a navy that could not be used by a corrupt administrator for his corrupt purposes.

Mr. GOFF. Do you say there has been no appropriation?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Why did you not shape your appropriations so that the ships could be built?

Mr. GOFF. Who brought in the appropriation bills?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. It is useless, since the Republican party has been in power since 1865, and if we find ourselves helpless and defenseless against assault, to charge the Democratic party is responsible for it. Why is it, when they have had the purse of this country and could have voted millions, and did vote millions for every other purpose, that they never voted a cent for the purpose of reconstructing and building up a navy? Why is it that during all this time you have done nothing for the fortifications of this country? Why is it, after there have been Republican administrations since 1865, we are helpless and defenseless? And now you come here and undertake to charge us, because we do not make appropriations to construct a navy all in one year, with being responsible for all this dereliction.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED, of Maine. Whenever I hear a gentleman on the Democratic side make that kind of oration, and I hear him very often, I know there is only one man in the whole House that believes it, and that is the man who is making it. [Laughter.]

Now the fact about this whole business of the Navy is this; I have witnessed considerable of it myself: The Democratic party came in possession of the House at the Forty-fourth Congress. From that time on, except when we had a Republican House during one Congress, there has been no appropriation for the building of ships until last year, and of that appropriation the Secretary of the Navy thus far has declined to avail himself. The Democratic House inaugurated the system of appropriating millions for repairs, but not a dollar to build a ship. And yet their orators are continually discoursing here about our not having a navy and about a Republican administration being responsible for it. Now, is it not about time that kind of silly talk had an end? When you can not believe yourselves what you are saying, is it worth while to talk it to your constituencies? Are they more ignorant than you are, do you think? [Laughter.] It is a heavy charge to make against them. Yet you reiterate this again and again. I would not be surprised, however, if the gentleman from West Virginia was the last man to do it. It has probably struck bed-rock.

The truth about it is when you came into power in the House of Representatives you did not know what to do with your power any more than you do now when you come into power in the country. You did not understand it, and you are feeling around in the dark trying to do something and making a conspicuous failure of it before the whole community. And the worst of it is you perpetuate in the minds of the community the failures you are making by this kind of oration.

There is a proper place in this bill to do something for the coast defense. You had some excuse for not doing it when you simply had the recommendations of a Republican Department—I mean an excuse founded on your own ideas of things; but then, with your own ideas of things, when a Democratic Secretary of the Navy comes here and recommends this thing and this money is to be expended by him and you declare you want it spent, why do you not do it? [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two in relation to the arrogant and impudent remarks of the gentleman from Maine. There is but one thing more reprehensible than ignorance, and that is impudence and impertinence.

Mr. REED, of Maine. You ought to know. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. One may be excusable for not knowing, but he is not excusable for impertinence.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is the gentleman testifying as an expert? [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. No, sir. If I wanted an expert on impertinence I would call upon you, for I know of no gentleman more expert in that line. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not understand by what right the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] undertakes, in his arrogant manner, to control the expression of opinion upon this subject.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I never undertook to control your opinion.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Well, it is not because you had not the impudence to do it. The Republican party came into power in this country in 1865. That was in the Forty-fourth Congress. They then had complete control of the reconstruction of the Navy, if they had desired to reconstruct it, and if they did not rebuild the Navy then, nor from that time down, why is it that they undertake now, because we were partially in power in one or two Congresses, to hold us responsible for that dereliction, and get up here and undertake to lecture us in this manner? If the gentleman from Maine desires by argument to prove that we have been derelict in this respect, let him do so; but I want to say to him that I am tired of the arrogant manner in which he undertakes to wield the whip here, and I for one will not submit to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I should think you would be tired of it.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Are not you tired of it?

Mr. PAYNE. I believe you are.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Anybody with good taste would be. Now, Mr. Chairman, all I desired to say was that these gentlemen have no right to hold us responsible because the Navy has not been rebuilt. In my opinion, both parties have been derelict in not rebuilding the Navy of this country. I had rather, to-day, see money appropriated for the reconstruction of our Navy so that it might carry our flag all over the world than for any other purpose, and I do not believe that this nation can ever take its proper place among the nations of the earth without a first-class navy. [Applause.]

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has made a very round assertion here, that we Democrats are responsible for the policy of appropriating for repairs only, and not for the building of ships. He says we inaugurated that policy. Now let us look at the facts. I have turned very hastily to such of the appropriation bills for past years as I have at hand, and what is the result? I take the appropriations for 1872, when the Republicans were in power, and I read the item for repairs, as follows:

For preservation of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of material; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and general maintenance of the Navy; incidental expenses, advertising and foreign postages, $3,500,000.

Turning to 1873 I find under the same head an appropriation of $3,500,000. In 1874 I find $3,270,000, and in 1875, $3,300,000. All these are appropriations for repairs. Now, turning to 1876, which I believe was the first year the Democrats had control here, I find the appropriations for repairs cut down to $1,750,000, and so it goes on from that time down to the present. I have the book here containing all the appropriations, so that any gentleman who desires may look at the figures, and he will find that the appropriations under the head of repairs have steadily decreased under Democratic control until in the present bill, reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs and just agreed upon here, the amount is only $980,000. So much for the facts.

Mr. REED, of Maine. To the gentleman from Alabama, for whom I have very sincere respect, I desire to make serious reply. I remember very distinctly the first Congress of which I was a member, and the naval appropriation bill of that year. I remember that it struck me as a very singular thing, showing a very remarkable state of public sentiment, that so much money was spent upon repairs. Indeed, I recollect saying at that time, to such an extent was the custom of making repairs carried, that they would take a hawser-hole and repair around it—would do anything rather than use the term "ship-building."

At the close of the war we found ourselves with a very large navy, such as it was. It was a good navy for those times; but like everything else it wore out. There being nothing done but simply repairs, the vessels wore out and became obsolete. The Democrats, when they came into power in this House, were entirely unwilling to make any appropriation for the building of ships; and everybody in this House knows that they have steadily fought against such a policy ever since. The first attempt that was made to create a new navy suitable for the present time was made by the Forty-seventh Congress, Mr. Chandler being at that time Secretary of the Navy. Under his wise administration, under his administration, which will bear all the scrutiny and criticism that gentlemen choose to put upon it, it was determined to discontinue in a very large measure the work in the navy-yards, where only the old wooden ships could be built, to take a new departure and begin the construction of a new navy. It is this policy which is attempted to be carried out in the "new-ship bill" reported by the Democratic Committee on Naval Affairs.

Now, there were built or begun certain monitors which it is believed by prominent naval authorities, and with the indorsement of the Secretary of the Navy, will be useful for coast defense. If there is anything we need now it is vessels suitable for coast defense. Now, the question is, will you pass this amendment recommended by your own Secretary of the Navy, in pursuance of a plan formed years ago, and thus carry out work already begun? The vote on this amendment will show whether you mean to do that or not.

The question being take on the amendment of Mr. GOFF, there were—ayes 67, noes 69.

Mr. GOFF. I make the point that no quorum has voted, and call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GOFF and Mr. HERBERT were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 88.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HERBERT. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, had directed him to report back the same with amendments, and to recommend that it be passed as amended.

Mr. HERBERT. As there is, I believe, no particular contest on any amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, I suggest, and I presume it will be consented to on the other side, that the question on all the amendments be taken in gross.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the question is upon agreeing in gross to the various amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HERBERT. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. GOFF. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs with instructions to report it back with the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. For the completion of the double-turreted monitors Puritan, Amphitrite, Monadnock, and Terror, the sum of $3,178,046 is hereby appropriated, distributed as follows:

For the completion of the Puritan, $969,232.

For the completion of the Amphitrite, $651,084.

For the completion of the Monadnock, and for the construction of engines for said vessel, $918,942.

For the completion of the Terror, $638,788.

Mr. GOFF. On agreeing to this motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 52 voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HERBERT. It was agreed that at 3 o'clock the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] should call up the resolutions relative to the death of Senator MILLER, of California. I will therefore ask that the further consideration of this bill be now suspended, in order to proceed with that order.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered on the passage of the bill, and it will come up on Monday morning immediately after the reading of the Journal. Is there objection to laying the bill aside at this time? The Chair hears none.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

Mr. SPOONER. The gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] has consented I should report resolutions from the Committee on Accounts for the purpose of having them referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It is necessary they should have immediate consideration.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee an Accounts, reported back the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

House resolution for the payment of Frank H. Isham and William E. Mallory for services in the document-room, House of Representatives;

House resolution for the payment of Jacob Pendle for services as a laborer;

House resolution providing additional payment to George Winters and L. B. Cook, conductors of elevator;

House resolution providing for additional compensation to Noah W. Halley, a folder acting as messenger;

House resolution for payment of funeral expenses of Charles S. Trentlen; and House resolution providing additional compensation to Frank B. Gorman, a laborer, acting as a page.

PUBLIC BUILDING, DAYTON, OHIO.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. In view of the fact I shall be compelled to be absent for ten days, I renew the motion that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 856) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Dayton, Ohio.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a suitable site, and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Dayton, in the State of Ohio, a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office, internal-revenue office, pension office, and for other Government uses. The site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $150,000; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys; and for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, and the State of Ohio shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was read, as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 13, insert the following:

"Nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

There was no objection, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill and amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, CLARKSBURG, W. VA.

Mr. GOFF. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4335) making an appropriation to continue the construction of the public building at Clarksburg, W. Va., and changing the limit of cost thereof.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act for the construction of a court-house and post-office at Clarksburg, W. Va.," approved March 3, 1885, be amended by making the limit of cost of the said building, including site, $85,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost thereof.

SEC. 2. That said extension of limit is made for the purpose of admitting of a necessary enlargement of the present plan of the said building, and of providing fire-proof construction; and the sum of $35,000 is hereby appropriated for the said building, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment of the commmittee was read, as follows:

In line 7, strike out "$85,000" and insert "$80,000."

There was no objection, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill and amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GOFF moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRANT AND HIS GENERALS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks, by unanimous consent, to have printed in the RECORD the body of a petition from ex-Union soldiers in reference to Bolling's painting of "Grant and his Generals."

There was no objection, and the petition is as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned, ex-Union soldiers and members of the Grand Army of the Republic, having heard with regret that Bolling's great painting of "Grant and his Generals" is about to be sold and removed from this city, respectfully petition the honorable Senate and House of Representatives to take some action toward its retention by purchase, so that it may remain in the city of Washington, where it may be viewed by soldiers and their relatives, very few of whom have not been under the command of or in battle with some one of the officers there so faithfully, accurately portrayed.

Of the twenty-seven there represented only eleven are living. Their original likenesses can never be grouped together on the same canvas, and its purchase and preservation by Congress would be gratifying to every American.

Its value to the people can scarcely be named in money.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR MILLER.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the notice given heretofore I now call up for consideration the resolutions of the Senate in relation to the death of Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from California, and ask that they be read.

The Senate resolutions were read, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, May 27, 1886.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from the State of California.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute of regard to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORROW. In connection with the resolutions which have just been read I desire to offer the following resolutions and ask their present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has received with great sorrow the official announcement of the death of JOHN F. MILLER, late a Senator from the State of California.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be afforded to members to give expression of the sentiments they entertain for the life, character, and public services of the late Senator MILLER, and the loss sustained by the country in the death of so able and faithful public servant.

Resolved, That at the conclusion of these tributes to his memory the House stands adjourned.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to advocate the adoption of the resolutions which have just been read. At the same time I desire to offer brief testimony of my own personal regard for the memory of JOHN F. MILLER, as well as to call the attention of the House to some of the salient characteristics of that distinguished citizen as they fell under my own personal observation during my acquaintance with him.

JOHN F. MILLER was born in the State of Indiana. He came to manhood at a time when the great questions which culminated ultimately in the civil war were agitating the people of that State. In common with a large body of the younger men of Indiana, he espoused heartily everywhere the cause of the Union and the proposition to uphold the supremacy of the Constitution; and when the war broke out the call of the Government for troops came to him as a baptism, and he entered the Union Army imbued with the true sentiments of the period in which he lived. He went into the war as a Union man.

Whatever may be said now, looking backward over that period of time, JOHN F. MILLER lived in the present of that time and not in the prospective future; for it is within my own personal knowledge that he accepted in the fullest degree the idea of the martyred President, that the war was to be waged as a war for the preservation of the Union, and he adopted, without reservation in the present or prospective enlargement in the future, the utterance of Lincoln, "I would save the Union with slavery if I can, but if I can not save the Union without destroying slavery, I will save the Union."

It was under the inspiration of that sentiment, the real Union sentiment of 1861, that JOHN F. MILLER joined the armies of the Union. I first became a subordinate to him at a time when neither of us had received or witnessed the baptism of blood; and the first day that I ever reported to him for duty was at a time when he had received an order, during the memorable eight weeks of what we have termed the blockade of Nashville in the fall of 1862, to proceed with his command, by night march, to attack an outpost of the enemy at Lavergne. I speak of Lavergne because I have treasured it always in my memory. It was at Lavergne, or on our way to it, that I heard the first whistle of a bullet fired by an enemy of the flag of my country, and I know that the same deep impression was made upon him as upon me, for when I visited California I learned that the beautiful home which he had reared for himself in the magnificently beautiful valley of Napa was called Lavergne, indicating that the impressions were upon him as they had been upon me, and were most lasting in their duration.

I remember very well the circumstances of that march. I remember very well the early daylight attack upon the enemy. With a vastly superior force we surprised the small force there, and captured the most of them and stampeded the rest. It was an insignificant battle as compared with the great battles which followed; it was insignificant in the numbers engaged; it was insignificant in the blood which was shed, and insignificant in its results; but yet it gave to the Army of the Cumberland, or that portion of it which was engaged, an opportunity to mark the first step in the direction of actual war on the part of the men who were afterward to become famous during that struggle. I remember the plaudits of the Army of the Cumberland that were showered upon JOHN F. MILLER after his distinguished career at Stone River. It was an early exhibition on the part of a mere colonel of infantry, of a spirit which imbued the Army of the Cumberland later when, without the orders of the commander, and over against the suggestion of General Grant himself, they passed the rifle-pits at the foot of Missionary Ridge, charged to its top, and won a victory—a victory won by the private soldiers of the Army in obedience to orders which no general officer of the Army has been able to find a record of and no officer claims to have given. The orders were the sound of the enemy's guns—the orders which carried gallant old Jim Steedman to the glory he won at Chickamauga.

At Stone River JOHN F. MILLER made a demonstration of the same character, and crowned his career in that battle with a result grandly significant and valuable to the Union Army. He was wounded. It was supposed he was permanently disabled. But six months afterward, when the great army under Rosecrans refitted and reorganized, and in magnificent battle array, on the 24 day of June, 1863, poured out from their camps at Murfreesborough and moved by divers lines of communication in the direction of the Tennessee River, JOHN F. MILLER rode out at the head of his brigade, the incarnation of war in the person of a volunteer officer, and with a bright view ahead of him. His career up to that time had given a promise that nobody doubted the fulfillment of. But in an insignificant engagement incident to the long march to Tullahoma and Manchester he fell again, terribly wounded, in the affair at Liberty Gap. I remember well when he was being carried back to the rear with a wound that ultimately terminated his life. I remember the look that was on his face, and I remember a single utterance. Hopeful words were being spoken to him as to his recovery, and consolation was being administered to him by his comrades around him, and he said just this: "I estimate no importance so far as my own personal future is concerned, as compared with the disappointment that I shall not participate to the end in this great campaign."

A career that would have been second to that of no volunteer officer of the Union Army, in my judgment, was by that bullet, that fatal bullet, turned aside, and General MILLER was assigned to a duty which took him out of the active command of active troops in the front. Very few men would have remained in the service under such circumstances. Patriotism inspired him to hold on. A high sense of duty, a high sense, as he termed it, of gratitude to his State and to his country that had conferred the honors upon him induced him to stay and do what he might do to still further promote the interests of the Union Army.

He was assigned to the very important and delicate position of Nashville. Nashville at that time contained more property belonging to the Government than any other place south of the Ohio River. The population was a mixed one. It was made up of citizens with strong rebel tendencies and citizens with strong Union tendencies, and there were bitter antagonisms. Out from Nashville radiated the power of the Union, and out of Nashville also radiated the influence of our enemy. The friends of many a fighting confederate remained there, and property rights and confusion of all kinds pressed upon the commander of the post.

Conflicting interests arose everywhere, and General MILLER became a sort of civil or quasi-civil commander. No man ever did his duty better; no man ever more justly won the high esteem and confidence of the people of a city or of his commanders in the army or of his whole people than did JOHN F. MILLER. He was unflinching in the discharge of duty and yet always considerate of the rights of men; and to-day his memory is green among the men who loved the Union in Nashville, and he is held in high regard among the people who at that time were the enemies of the Union.

He was there with the Army of the Cumberland under Thomas when it won its grandest victory. He contributed by the organization of the forces in the city and the surrounding positions greatly to the efficiency of the army which on the 15th and 16th of December, 1864, encountered the army under Hood in the last great struggle for supremacy in Tennessee. And from the top of Overton Hill, JOHN F. MILLER, disfigured and almost destroyed by the bullets of the enemy, looked out upon the broken masses of Hood's army as they retreated shattered and disorganized toward Brentwood, and understood, as we all understood, that his career in the Army had ended. Well had he done his work, and well had gained rank, fame, and the gratitude of his country.

I did not rise to speak at any length of JOHN F. MILLER as a citizen. Others will do that who knew him better. Others will speak of his career since the war. I came here simply to testify to his character and attainments as a soldier and to give them my meed of praise. He was strictly a volunteer soldier. He had no training in arms; and yet within a year and a half after he joined his regiment his military attitude, his military bearing, his military character was formed, and he showed to the world that he had in him the stuff, the elements that make a great military commander.

Since that time his career has been that of a civilian. He achieved success everywhere, rapid success, which crowned his efforts on behalf of the Union, crowned his efforts on behalf of his country. Afterward he carried from his native State and handed over to the Golden State of California an allegiance that never faltered, and he became identified with and an advocate of her interests with the same zeal, the same courage, the same high purpose that he had brought to the discharge of every duty that he had ever attempted the performance of.

I testify from my own knowledge of him that he was a patriotic citizen, that he was a successful soldier, that he made the highest sacrifice that any man could make for his country, that in civil life he was clear-headed and patriotic, always standing by the right, never flinching, never compromising, never yielding his convictions of duty and justice.

In social life among his friends and in his family, he was a gentle, kind, good man. Out upon the shore of the Pacific, in the soil of the State that he loved, and to which, as I have said, he carried his ripest allegiance, he lies to-day, his career ended. Over his grave the tears of affection will be shed. Upon his grave will be heaped the laurels of affection for many a year to come. May the time never come when his example shall not be to the people of this country a bright, a burning, a shining light.

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, a leader has fallen. A man is gone! We pause to-day for a little while in the midst of our public duties to contemplate a life and a lesson which, if given due consideration, may tend quite as much to the welfare and honor of the Republic as if the hour were given to the ordinary tasks of legislation.

We stand to-day in the presence of that most impressive phenomenon, a finished life—a completed life-work; in the presence of that greatest mystery of all our being, the dissolution of that subtile tie which binds the soul to the mortal frame, and which being unbound, the form which has been a thing of power and beauty lapses to corruption, and the masterful spirit, unchained from its fetters of flesh, flies whither all sense fails to discern and faith alone can follow.

That noblest work of God, an honest man, as an actual presence, has ceased from among men.

Except as a memory and an influence his life is ended, his work is complete to our limited perceptions. The eye that flashed with intelligence is dark; the voice that quivered with emotion or inspired like the summons of a trumpet in the crash of battle is silent; the hand of might is nerveless; the presence which was familiar in court and camp and council is seen no more among men. A power that moved men, that wielded communities, that shaped destinies, has ceased to manifest itself. In brief, a man is gone! And yet it is because he is not wholly gone that we pause to celebrate this memorial to-day.

The fountains which he touched still flow; the trains of events which he set in motion still operate; lives which he molded and directed still multiply and extend his influence; blows that he struck still resound throughout the land; winged words that he uttered still fly from lip to lip, overleaping the narrow boundaries of mortal life.

The present century has been full of great thoughts and great words, and among the greatest has been the thought and the word "evolution." And there is no grander field for study than the evolution of a life—of life from life.

I do not mean this in the narrow sense of the evolution of natural or animal life, the mere relighting of a torch from the embers of a dying fire. I mean rather the study of the development of character from the action and interaction of all the forces and agencies that impinge upon and penetrate life.

It is because the deceased Senator had become a factor in this process of evolution of national life that the business of the House is suspended that we may dwell upon the event and study the character of him whom we commemorate.

Here we contemplate him stripped of all adventitious surroundings. He was a Senator; he is a Senator no more. He was a military leader; he is a general no longer. He commanded great enterprises; he commands them not now. Whatever he may have been by virtue of rank or office or station, he is now simply a man, a character. As such let us speak of him.

The late Senator MILLER was not personally known to me, except as a public man. I knew him only as we all know men who touch the multitudes, the masses of men; as we know the men who by strong powers are lifted up into sight of the many.

Let us measure this man, if we can, and ascertain what it was in his life that made him what he was; that gave him power to command and gained him the confidence and love of a great Commonwealth, whose commission he bore.

First let us glance at the outside of his life.

He was born in 1831, in Southern Indiana, of parents who had removed, first from Virginia, then from Kentucky, and who were of Scotch and Swiss descent—two strong and liberty-loving races.

He was nurtured in the school of independence and self-support. He was well cultured in youth and trained to a knowledge of the law.

When he had scarcely more than attained his majority he cut loose from home and old friends and struck out into the romantic, the almost mythical, the golden West—the modern El Dorado.

In the broad, free, and somewhat unpolished spirit of that rough new land he grew into the firm mold of a strong, self-reliant, and adventurous manhood.

Recalled by the demands of filial duty, to which he was ever responsive, he returned to his former home and to the practice of his exacting profession.

It was at a time when ancient parties were breaking up and going to pieces in the fierce throes of a mighty moral upheaval.

In the heat of this smithy of the gods, where thunderbolts were forging, the character, well modeled by heredity, shaped by education, strengthened and broadened by travel and experience of rude frontier life, was tempered and hardened into enduring texture.

The cry of the oppressed, of the millions deprived of the common rights and privileges of humanity, came up to him with an irresistible appeal that smote upon his conscience and his volition as the voice of God.

Then the divine ichor that had been distilled into ancestral blood within sight of the majestic vision of Mont Blanc, or the awful heights of the Jungfrau, or that had hardened the sinews of some progenitor at Bannockburn, stirred within his veins, and the august summons of Liberty to do battle in her cause found in young MILLER a ready and obedient votary.

So we find him in 1860, at the age of twenty-nine, a member of the senate of his native State, as a representative of that young and burning and puissant party which demanded that no more virgin Territories should be laid in the arms of the unholy Moloch of slavery. We shall never forget that year. It was the Lincoln year. It was a year when men seemed to break away from all the traditions of their lives and surrender themselves to the control of one overpowering sentiment, that now or never was the time to stay the further spread of human slavery in this land.

Men may reason as they please as to the origin and the causes of this wonderful wave of enthusiasm which swept over the country, and which bore us with a resistless impulse, first to a political revolution, and then into the dreadful throes of war, from which we emerged bloody and chastened, but freed from the "body of death" of slavery; but as for me, I can only believe that the time had come in the eternal counsels of God when the consummation of His divine purpose for the good of the race required that slavery should perish from this land, and He raised such instrumentalities as He could to execute His purpose.

As was so eloquently said not long since in this House by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], "As I look back to that dread panorama after the lapse of twenty years I see, or I seem to see, the stately steppings of that Providence which was using the wrath of man to work out His own comprehensive and beneficent purpose."

Into the resistless sweep and swirl of impulses and events of that great crisis young MILLER was drawn unresisting. He recognized at once the part and the place to which he was called, and accepted it. While serving in the senate of his State the war came. He had not reached his thirtieth year. He recognized the fact that in a popular government the will of the majority must be supreme. He recognized the further fact that the responsibility of the ballot in peace implies the responsibility of the bayonet in time of war.

The very institution of popular government implies that minorities will be submissive to the will of the majority and seek the rectification of supposed grievances only at the ballot-box. But suppose that minorities do not submit, but resort to armed combinations too formidable to be repressed by the civil power, what then? There remains but one alternative—the conflict of arms or the death of popular institutions.

In common with the manhood of the North, Mr. MILLER felt that this Union and these institutions were a sacred and solemn trust for unpeopled States and for unborn centuries—a trust which it would be base to betray and cowardly to surrender.

I shall never forget how, in the spring of 1862, I one morning heard an Italian organ-grinder upon the streets of a Michigan city plying his vocation. Even his organ had been set to the popular impulse and was wailing forth the strains of The Star Spangled Banner, and as again and again the familiar refrain—

> Oh, say, does the Star-Spangled banner yet wave
> O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?—

floated out with plaintive and apprehensive cadence upon the morning air I fancied that in it I heard the voice of all the oppressed peoples of all climes and all ages beseeching us that the great Republic, the great experiment of "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," might not perish from the earth. We can not doubt that our friend heard that same voice and answered that same impulse.

Thus in the evolution of this life the strong, well-nurtured, well-cultured, self-reliant, and tempered young citizen and statesman became a soldier.

Military command was foreign to his life and habit, yet he had all the elements of a commander. I venture to say that when he threw himself into the ranks of war the question of command or rank scarcely occurred to him. He simply took the place to which he seemed to be called, the place to which he was fitted.

So from the senate he stepped to the head of a regiment, the Twenty-ninth Indiana, and soon found himself commander of a brigade. It was not that he was ambitious—not that he was self-seeking. It was the outworking of his formed character, of his natural powers.

I stood a few days ago in the midst of that silent city of the dead, on the crest where the waves of war broke in fire and blood along the hills of the Antietam, and gazed in admiration upon the colossal statue in granite of the private soldier of the Union. There, chiseled upon the enduring rock, is the sentiment which mustered armies, which won battles, which restored the Union, "Not for ourselves, but for our country." Oh, glorious sentiment of patriotism, which forgets self, which puts aside pleasure, and profit, and peace, to battle and suffer and die for the coming millions!

Senator MILLER became General MILLER. It is not my purpose to follow him in his military career, for I am studying character rather than annals. A single instance will suffice. At the battle of Stone River, December, 1862, there came a time when it seemed to him that the result hung trembling in the balance. Van Cleve's division, impetuously assailed, had yielded and fallen back, until the weight of the attack came upon MILLER'S line. The enemy showed a disposition to break through and divide our army in twain. MILLER had the river in his front. Most men would have awaited the attack with such defensive preparations as they could make. But that was not Colonel MILLER'S way. Audacity and daring were the characteristics of the man.

Without orders from any superior officer he dashed across the stream, attacked and drove the enemy's infantry, rushed upon and captured his guns and colors, restored the center, and saved the right wing of the army from disaster.

He assumed a very grave responsibility. Had the movement failed he might have been court-martialed. But it succeeded, and a grateful commander, recognizing how much he owed to this gallant and self-reliant officer, telegraphed the President from the field of battle recommending his promotion "for gallantry on the field."

In this action, though severely and dangerously wounded, Colonel MILLER refused to leave the field, feeling that as he had taken the responsibility and made the venture he should stay by his brigade until the victory was assured. This courage, or, as the speech of the plain people has named it, "pluck," was characteristic of his whole career as a soldier.

A wound, which well-nigh proved fatal, received while leading his brigade at Liberty Gap, deprived him of the sight of an eye, and for a time retired him from his command. With many this would have excused them from further service in the field; but not so with MILLER. With the leaden bullet still lodged in the eye-socket he returned to the field and to command, to share with the gallant and sturdy Thomas in the complete overthrow of Hood at Nashville, which was the definite beginning of the end—the collapse of the armed resistance of the confederacy.

At the close of the war he was offered a high commission in the regular Army. But he was not a soldier by profession or by choice. War with him was only the road to peace. To him the performance of military duty was only discharging one of the great obligations of citizenship. He declined the appointment. Through the years of excitement preceding the war, and throughout the grim and trying experiences of the war itself, he had never forgotten the dream of his youth—of a home on the sunset side of the continent. Civilization marches with the sun. Its cradle was in the Orient, and with a stately tidal sweep it has rolled around the planet until it has touched and filled the Occident.

By some occult impulse in all ages men have been impelled to "go west." General MILLER was under this spell. Whether it was the charm of the climate, or music and balm of "the Pacific Sea," or the love of being a factor in a new and rising empire that attracted him I know not. Perhaps all these. Something impelled him in the path of empire, and beyond the Sierras was to be his home, to build, to work, to die. There the President of the United States made him the chief fiscal agent of the Government upon the Pacific coast. Here he proved himself as efficient and faithful in peace as he had been brave and patriotic in war. He held the position of collector of customs for San Francisco for four years and declined reappointment.

In this, as in every other trust confided to him, another trait of his character was prominently illustrated—his strict integrity. But he did not confine himself to the simple discharge of his official duty. The breadth, energy, and progressiveness of his mind impelled him to take an active part in all the great social, political, and industrial movements of his State and section.

Three times he was elected by his party to represent it upon the electoral ticket, and in 1879 he became a member of the constitutional convention to relay the foundations of the State.

But he was pre-eminently a man of affairs. With the commercial and industrial development of the Pacific coast he was closely identified. He was among the first to apprehend the resources of our Alaskan possessions and seek their intelligent development. Everywhere he exhibited the traits which made him what he had grown to be—courage, firmness, persistence, self-reliance, patriotism, and integrity.

In 1880 he was summoned by his adopted State to take his place in the nation's highest council. With that capacity for growth and adaptation which was characteristic of him in every position to which he was called he stepped quietly and easily into the new sphere, and turned all the acquirements of his previous life as student, lawyer, Senator, soldier, and man of affairs to account in the discharge of his new duties. What he lacked he set himself with industry and persistence to acquire, and discharged the delicate duties of chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations with credit to himself and honor to his country.

But the zenith had been reached.

The shock which his constitution had received from the wounds and exposures of war had left their ineffaceable mark, their inevitable weakness.

He had risen with strong and steady step through the gradations of honor and usefulness only at the summit to feel the world sink under him.

He had achieved all that heart could wish of earthly good. Wealth, honor, fame, friendship, and the love of friends.

In the midst of all, the final summons came.

> Leaves have their time to fall,
> And flowers to wither at the north wind's breath,
> And stars to set; but all,
> Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

"It is given unto all men once to die." Whatever else we may be doing, whithersoever else our feet may be tending, one thing is absolutely sure, that every day and every hour we come nearer to—

> The undiscovered country from whose bourn
> No traveler returns.

It is but a question of a few years, a few days, a few hours. And when they are past years dwindle to the span of hours.

The main question is not when or where, but how. No time, no place, no circumstance is inapt for dying when man dies for humanity; and when, in March last, JOHN F. MILLER, in this city of Washington, gave up his life, he but completed the offering which he made to his country in 1861.

This, then, is the character which we have disclosed, and which has entered into and become a part of the nation's life.

A boy born with the sturdy independence and love of liberty of his Swiss and Scotch ancestry mingled with staunch and staying qualities of the Anglo-Saxon race.

A youth well nurtured and molded for manly effort and achievement by the blessed necessity which has been upon our American boys of making their own way in the world.

A young manhood adventurous and courageous, firm-knit and fibrous, reaching out into new fields for work and conquest.

A manhood strong, masterful, dutiful, patriotic, holding not his life dear for his country's sake, audacious at need, puissant among men, subduing obstacles to his will, in the fight to stay until the dawn of victory and peace should come with its cooling dews and tender sunshine to soothe and heal the wounds of war. A man of affairs without stain and without reproach. A statesman of broad views, possessed of the confidence of his people and the respect of his colleagues. Truly this is an American character of the best type, an evolution of government by the people.

Though he has fallen when, in the ordinary course of events, years of honorable and useful life should have lain before him, we can not say that it is an unfinished life.

> Virtue, not rolling suns, the mind matures;
> That life is long which answers life's great end.

The future of this Republic shall be better, safer, grander for the life of JOHN F. MILLER. In that rising empire by the Pacific which now hymns his requiem, may many a young man arise who shall emulate his manly virtues and repeat his life.

Mr. LOUTTIT addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the death of Hon. JOHN F. MILLER, Senator of the State of California, severs the tie of a pleasant friendship, not intimate, but real, between him and myself. At the request of his colleagues in this House I have a melancholy satisfaction in saying a few words to testify my respect for the citizen, soldier, and Senator whose loss the country and his native and adopted States sincerely deplore.

His paternal stock was Virginia, a fact which creates a kinship no Virginian can ignore. From Franklin County, one of the most southern of those in piedmont Virginia, his father emigrated to Southern Indiana, where Mr. MILLER was born in 1831.

His robust nature was nurtured to a hardy manhood in the schools of his native State, and he received his legal training at a law school in the city of New York, whence he emigrated to the then new Commonwealth of the Pacific, in whose service in the United States Senate he died.

In the mean time he had returned to Indiana and taken honorable position in her Legislature; and at the breaking out of the civil war he accepted the commission of colonel in one of her regiments. During the four years of war he performed his part in that dread drama with unsurpassed heroism, and, bearing on his person the scars of honorable wounds won in many battles, he retired at the close of the struggle with the distinctions of numerous brevets for courage and good conduct and the well-earned rank of a major-general.

He returned to civil life in California, and was in 1881 sent by that State to the Senate of the United States as successor to Mr. Booth.

It was here that I first knew him, and our relations were cordial and close during the period of the debates on the Chinese question, in which he took prominent position in the Senate and I took the same side on this floor.

In the maturity of his powers and prime of his life he yielded as a Christian hero to the summons of death, and closed a well-spent life in the hope, as I humbly trust, of a blessed immortality, inspired by faith in the Divine Author of our Christian religion.

In his origin, nativity, and life his experience took in the extremes and the great middle valley of the continent. From the ancestral home in an Atlantic State to that of his birth in the Mississippi Valley, and, finally, to that on the Pacific shore, he was an American citizen of the truest type, His destiny was, by origin, birth, and life, with the American Union.

As a Representative of Virginia in this House and as a citizen of Virginia during the period of civil convulsion when his attitude was in antagonism to all my opinions, I find no difficulty in paying unstinting tribute to his merits as a soldier and a statesman. Differences of opinion breed diverse convictions as to duty, but when the one are honestly formed and the other are conscientiously maintained the natural outgrowth of a chivalrous magnanimity is a sincere and genuine mutual respect and esteem. The man who is sincere and devout even in the maintenance of error is a nobler being than the man who is insincere and false in his advocacy of truth. Infallibility is not given to man. "To err is human," but sincerity, the love of truth, and a conscience void of offense toward God and man are admirable and noble though they be allied to error.

On this high plane—once enemies, now friends, once aliens, now allies and fellow-citizens of this great Union of republican Commonwealths—we can, we must, let us vow on the altar of a common country we will, forget and forgive the past, will cease criminations and recriminations, and will, with hearty respect for honest differences of opinion and convictions, henceforth unite in an honorable emulation to make the reunion of the States more glorious than the old Union, in conserving the liberties of the people, and in promoting the welfare and progress of our whole country in the great future of its destiny.

I believe that such were the feelings of the Senator whose memory we this day honor. His character and his abilities were broad and large enough to embrace the whole Union.

His courage, as a personal quality, was unquestionable. It was of the aggressive type. He felt the guadium certaminis when war raged. To him danger was delight, his exposure to it an exhilaration. When prudence prompted hesitancy in others, his undaunted spirit impelled him to audacity to achieve what doubt deemed impossible. The story of his military career is replete with all that makes the history of a dashing cavalier and a knightly hero.

But when war closed and peace came his combative spirit rested beneath the shadow of its wings. The arm uplifted in battle embraced his former foe in the grasp of a restored brotherhood. He gave the solid talents and the heroic character he had devoted to his country on the battlefield to the healing of the wounds of war and to the culture of the arts of peace.

May we not hope that those who survive him may follow this noble example. Let us exorcise from our debates the demon of hate and bitter memories, and link the earnest efforts of the living to the patriotism and magnanimity of the lamented dead in preserving the Union for which he fought, with all the rights of the States and the people under the Constitution, for which we should all contend, as the heritage of his and our posterity to the remotest generations!

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, General JOHN F. MILLER, late United States Senator from California, was the son of a pioneer in the Great West. He was a farmer's boy and learned stability at the plow. His father, and he with him, encountered early in life those vicissitudes which develop and strengthen character and fit men for important duties in life. At the hearth-stone at which General MILLER was nurtured there were none but healthful influences. His father belonged to the yeomanry of the land, that sterling class that gives to our country its strength in peace and its valor in war. There came to his home neither the poverty that pinches nor the wealth that becomes a burden. Through industry and frugality the elder Miller was enabled to dispense charity, which he did without ostentation.

Senator MILLER'S mother was a woman who possessed splendid native ability, and realized, of a truth, that those who hold the guiding-strings above the children at the hearthstone exercise a mightier influence in the Republic than those who make its laws. She knew, as did her husband, that at the hearth-stones of America the sure and lasting foundations of our free government are laid. She realized as well that the country could not safely trust the man whose palate had a quicker sensation than his heart, and that in our country pure hearts are mightier for the defense of freedom than strong arms. She, with her husband, appreciated the advantages of liberal education; and hence, though opportunities for schooling were not ample as now, yet the children of that household went forth with minds well trained and stored with useful knowledge. They did not bear with them wealth which is estimated in shekels, but had for their portion a better heritage, rich mental furnishing, hearts devoted to duty, untiring industry, all supplemented and upheld by a rugged honesty that does not wear away by use.

With such surroundings, it is not strange that the children who went forth from the Miller homestead after having grown to manhood should each have become a blessing to the community in the midst of which he cast his lot. Blessed with great physical strength and a sound mind and with a quickened sense of duty to God and his fellow-men, General MILLER began his career in life. I will not trace that career; others have and others will bear evidence that it was in many things brilliant, in all things worthy. I was not intimate with him, but our families were so related through marriage that I had opportunity to learn something of the characteristics of the family and the stern virtues which marked the character of the general.

An intimate acquaintance with General MILLER was not essential to learn that he was a man of mark. I do not mean to say that he was brilliant. His intellect shone rather with a sure and steady light. His mind was well balanced, and of him I think it can be as truly said as of any man in public life that in deciding upon a course of action duty was supreme. Our country does not find its greatest security in the fact that there are men among us who are transcendently brilliant; whose exploits in the field and in the forum challenge the attention and admiration of the world. They come but to perform a service which requires possibly but a day or a year, or at most a half a score of years—a service that involves but one controlling thought; and not unfrequently the heart is not co-laborer with the hand, and the voice too frequently but echoes sentiments that are the obvious outgrowth of existing conditions, and which are not coined from the crucible of serious thought and reflection, nor come of inspiration which sometimes springs from a life devoted to duty.

The greater security is found in the development of those moral and intellectual conditions which are born of the influences which surrounded and pervaded the home of General MILLER'S childhood. He had been taught to listen to the "still small voice" that comes in the hush of the night and teaches as never man taught. He had learned to lean upon that stronger arm, and as into the valley and shadow he walked that voice comforted him and that arm sustained him even to the end. He has passed away from among us. That MILLER lived and that he died we know; but what that death portends, what it is, except that under its strange influences the heart ceases to beat, the lips become dumb, the eyes sightless, and the ears stopped up, and the flesh grows cold and crumbles into dust, we do not know. That we, too, must die we also know. That it is better to live well seems clear even according to the world's philosophy, that which is most materialistic; for whether death ends all or is but the beginning of another life, the experience of mankind would seem to leave no doubt that things are so ordered that our chief joy will be found in the faithful discharge of duty.

This I know to have been the abiding faith of General MILLER. It was his struggle to walk in the light and to bear testimony in his life (not pretending to be free from frailties) to the truth that was great within him. The calm resignation he manifested on his approaching dissolution, the perfect confidence he had that this life is but the germ of immortality, enabled the believer to say, "It is well with him." As I stood beside the dead I found myself repeating the words of Cato:

> It must be so,—Plato, thou reasonest well!—
> Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
> This longing after immortality?
> Or whence this secret dread, and inward horror,
> Of falling into naught? Why shrinks the soul
> Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
> 'T is the divinity that stirs within us;
> 'T is heaven itself that points out an hereafter,
> And intimates eternity to man.

Whether in the field where sin is atoned by the shedding of blood, whether in the Senate or in the quiet walks of life, JOHN F. MILLER was guided and upheld by an unwavering belief in the precepts and example of the Nazarene. Supported by that Christian faith, he placed his own in the mighty but unseen hand of the Eternal Father, and with unfaltering step and cheering hope he walked through the shadows into that land from which, though separated from us by a thin veil which a straw might rend, no echoes come.

General MILLER won fame on the field of battle. He won distinction and honor in the Senate. He won riches in the field of business enterprise. His fame may not outlast this generation, the honor he won be forgot, his riches must perish, but the sublime faith I have mentioned abides with him still. It is immortal as the spirit it leavens. His last witness was that compared to this faith the honors he had won were dross—were nothing. It is a pleasure to do honor to the memory of such a man as General MILLER whose private and public life was full of usefulness and without reproach. Such lives are too few, the influence of such examples too little heeded.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Speaker, Theodore Parker said, "It is no merit in a man to die." Grief will not pause to dispute it. The deceased is not concerned. "Nor praise, nor blame, nor love, nor hate, nothing can touch him further." But death may instruct the living.

It is a wise provision that death, though as "common as the most vulgar thing to sense," and always to be expected, yet is always sudden. In its suddenness is the emphasis of its lesson. It admonishes by shock mortality of immortality. It points from time to eternity, and its victim must have indeed passed a barren existence if he leave not precept to assist to endure earth or deserve Heaven.

In Senator MILLER'S life there were sweet lessons for both. In every place he was adequate; in every relation exact and dutiful. His ability was animated and urged by good intention. He dreamed no dreams. He sought results and accomplished them. He was religious, not in form and ceremony only, but in feeling. It was visible in the rectitude of his life. It was noticeable in his character. He was conscientious. Had he been less so he would have been alive to-day. His place was in Washington; the hazard of the trip he would not consider. Disease might intermit its hold and it was his duty to be ready. This his standard, this the impulse and force of his life. He achieved more and deserved more than greater men, and whether we depict him as citizen or soldier or Senator or husband or father, praise swells to eulogy and a nation applauds.

Mr. Speaker, I have been summoned at the latest minute to take another's place. I could not refuse. I dislike to refer to it. It would be affectation to apologize. Had I longer time to prepare and greater ability I should have been anticipated and excelled by the eloquent gentlemen who have preceded me in tribute to the dead Senator, and every mark of respect California is eager to show her departed representative will be satisfied by my colleague who succeeds me. Mine is a suitable but subordinate part. Others have the gracious office of eulogy; mine is to describe the performance of a trust.

I was deputed with others, the country's proxy, to convey the remains of Senator MILLER to the Pacific coast. We executed the trust. Starting from the nation's capital, where his life was rounded and completed, yet ended, we speeded to the Mississippi and over it, to the Missouri and over it, across the plains and over the mountains, through pass and gorge and tunnels; on, on, at the rising of the sun, under his meridian beams, and at his setting; on, on, under the solemn stars; on, along the path of empire to its limits at the ocean, compassing a continent in a deed of tributary love.

At Colfax, on the western slope of the Sierras, midst snow silently falling, we fulfilled the nation's deputation and delivered our charge to the soldier comrades of the departed general, and to representatives from a sovereign State all that was mortal of her Senator.

Our office was done. A State assumed it, and then conducted it with solemn ceremony. Grief and love and respect claimed two days for indulgence and tribute, and then the funeral march to the grave. The day was beautiful, of gorgeous sunlight, as if prefiguring the glory of the resurrection to console wife and daughter and friends with the sweet hope of a reunion in Heaven. A city quit its traffic, hushed its life, and gathered to honor and mourn him. A State, a nation had showered offices and distinctions on him. "A little earth for charity" was now all either could give. The sun sank, pageantry faded, the multitude departed, then friends, then wife and daughter, and he was left to repose in his grave on Lome Mountain in the State he loved and served, overlooking the fair city and the ocean beyond whose waters as they beat against the coast sound everlasting farewells, everlasting earthly farewells.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, the tribute of respect that has been paid to the memory of the late Senator MILLER by those who were immediately associated with him in public affairs testifies how worthily he had discharged the public duties he had assumed to perform in the most important and honorable stations in the Republic. His career was an active and an eventful one, and the distinction he attained among his fellow-men was the result of honest, laborious, and well-directed efforts in public service.

The leading incidents of his life may be briefly told.

Born in Union County, Indiana, in the year 1831, he passed his youth and school days in the midst of scenes and adventures always associated with the occupation and development of a new country.

He was perhaps spared some of the privations encountered by many young men in the West by reason of the fact that his parents were able to give him the advantages of a good education before he took his start in life; but even under the most favorable circumstances no young man could grow to manhood in the West at that time without having his mettle tested in many ways. That young MILLER went through the usual ordeal with credit to himself is shown by the self-command and perfect confidence in himself he displayed in after years when confronted with new and unexpected emergencies.

He began the study of law at an early age, and graduated with distinction in 1852 from the New York State Law School. The next year we find him in California, practicing his profession with success at a bar noted for the ability of its lawyers and the wide range of its litigation.

In 1855 he returned to Indiana in consequence of the supposed serious illness of his mother, to whom he was greatly devoted. Her early recovery gave him the opportunity of resuming his professional and business relations in California, but the attractions of his family home and the inducements there offered him were sufficient to prevent his immediate return to the Golden State.

At the breaking out of the rebellion Mr. MILLER was a senator in the Indiana State Legislature, where he had achieved an enviable reputation for close attention to official duties and had demonstrated his capacity as a man of affairs.

He thus early in life won public confidence without any of the meretricious devices of the mere politician, and gained respect and esteem without any compromise with his dignity or self-respect.

His valor and patriotism drew him into the Army in 1861. Like many of our heroes of that period, he exchanged the duties of civil life for the dangers of the field without hesitation. The transition was easy and in accord with his active disposition, his undaunted courage, and his faith in the integrity and perpetuity of the Union.

His military career was one of honorable distinction from first to last. Entering the Army as colonel of the Twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, he attained the rank of brevet major-general, rendering gallant services in every rank and station to which he was assigned. At Stone River, Liberty Gap, and Nashville he was particularly conspicuous as a brave and skillful commander. It will not be necessary for me to repeat the incidents of his splendid military service. They have been outlined in military orders, preserved in the records of his regiment, brigade, and division, and have become a part of the brilliant and enduring history of this great country.

At the close of the war General MILLER declined further employment in the Army, and, although suffering from severe wounds, he proceeded to California to engage in the active duties of his profession. It was at this period that I first met him, and the acquaintance then formed soon ripened into a friendship that continued down to the day of his death.

Soon after General MILLER arrived in California he was appointed by President Johnson collector of the port of San Francisco. He held the office for four years, discharging its duties with great efficiency and good judgment, and gaining the entire confidence of the business community.

For ten years he was a leading officer of the Alaska Commercial Company, a well-known corporation on the Pacific coast. The character and policy of this corporation have often been commended, officially and otherwise, for its just and honorable dealings with the Government and its wise and generous treatment of employés. General MILLER'S association with an enterprise of this reputation shows that in private business as well as in public service he earned the gratitude of good people by furnishing an example worthy of imitation.

It is also worthy of mention that General MILLER never neglected his duties as a citizen. In all his business relations he was public spirited and generous. He was an ardent Republican, and always ready to labor for the success of his party, believing in its principles and having faith in the ability of the people to reach reform in the administration of Government affairs through party organization.

In 1879 he was elected a member of the constitutional convention of California, and participated in the formation of our present constitution. In 1881 he was elected a United States Senator by the Legislature of California for the term of six years. As a Senator his services were characterized by great attention to the detail of Congressional business in which the people of his State were interested. He was in the habit of responding promptly and pleasantly to every demand made upon him for a proper service. But with all his kindness of disposition he did not permit himself to be occupied with trifling matters to the exclusion of more important business.

He was deeply interested in the welfare of his State, and looked forward with great anxiety to the time when Congressional legislation or other action on the part of the General Government would solve some of the difficulties pertaining to our peculiar position on the Pacific coast. He was eminently a statesman of enlarged views, and, being well informed on all the leading questions of the day, was able to render to his State and the nation most important service.

His fame as a soldier and a statesman was not the gift of fortune or the chance of reckless adventure, but the hard-earned reward for faithful devotion to the welfare and glory of his country. He grew to commanding position with an adaptability of capacity which always marks the vigor of well-equipped manhood where the social forces are active and aggressive.

He was perhaps known to but few members of this House, but the place he occupied in the affairs of the country was distinctly marked and his influence everywhere felt. This House, therefore, performs its solemn duty on this occasion with the full knowledge that a page in its history is being given to one who achieved renown as the just distinction accorded to heroic and patriotic public services.

Mr. Emerson, in one of his admirable essays, discourses on the fact that many men of great figure are known to history by deeds which do not appear to justify their fame. "We can not," he says, "find the smallest part of the personal weight of Washington in the narrative of his exploits," and he mentions Philip Sidney, the Earl of Essex, Sir Walter Raleigh, and others, as men of distinction, who accomplished but few deeds worthy of historical mention. It is a fact that the character of a man can not be determined by the mere incidents of his life, no more than can the mass of the mountain be ascertained by measuring the altitude of its prominent peaks. In human nature, as elsewhere, the magnitude of force and power is not always disclosed by what is seen. Back of the visible action there may be a mental and moral combination, moving with certainty and winning success with apparent ease in grave emergencies. A man thus organized has character, and he may have genius. "He conquers because his arrival alters the face of affairs."

Senator MILLER possessed this latent power in a remarkable degree, and always commanded respect and confidence, not so much because of what he said or did, but because it was apparent that he could say and do much more if it were necessary.

The career of Senator MILLER was incomplete. The full measure of his capacity had not been attained. He had plans for the future, and had his life been spared his mature judgment and large experience would have been of untold value in the councils of the nation. He felt that he could be of service to his country, and even when his malady had become dangerous he refused to lay aside his work for needed rest. With the restless spirit of the wounded but gallant soldier who hears a summons in the notes of preparation for the coming battle, Senator MILLER came from his distant home at the commencement of the present session of Congress to engage in the active duties of legislation.

He knew the Angel of Death had come very near to him before—

> And wondered why he stayed his dart,
> Yet quailed not, but could meet him so,
> As any lesser friend or foe.

Such serene courage might again dismiss the unwelcome messenger. He would not weakly surrender even to the inevitable, but the struggle was all in vain. The energies of his scarred and overtaxed frame had broken from their natural channels and no human skill could restrain their wasting current.

The end came, and the spirit of a brave man found rest.

> Fair life to pulseless silence wed.

We all remember the solemn ceremony in this Capitol in memory of the deceased Senator, and the mournful pageant escorting his remains to their final sepulcher at Lone Mountain, by the restless sea. It was a fitting and deserved tribute to one whose life and character are worthy of all praise. Kind father, devoted husband, faithful friend, patriotic citizen and statesman, farewell! California has had other sons fall on the field of duty, but the waves of the Pacific have chanted no sadder requiem than they do to-day over the remains of JOHN FRANKLIN MILLER.

The question being taken on the resolutions, they were unanimously adopted.

And then, in accordance with the concluding resolution, the House (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

[SEAL.]

GEO. PEABODY WETMORE.
JOSHUA M. ADDEMAN,
Secretary of State.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be permitted to say a word in regard to the credentials of the Senator from Rhode Island.

I have had occasion to examine this subject with some care as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. A great many of the credentials which are presented are informal, although they contain a very long enumeration of unnecessary particulars. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these credentials seem to me a perfect and model form, which I wish all the States in the Union might copy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be placed on file.

WORLD'S PASTIME EXHIBITION AT CHICAGO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from the management of the World's Pastime Exhibition Company, of Chicago, Ill., inviting the Senate to attend and participate in the opening ceremonies of the exposition at Chicago on July 3, 1886, which will be read.

The letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 17, 1886.

DEAR SIR: The World's Pastime Exposition Company, of Chicago, Ill., as represented by the undersigned, citizens' committee and exposition officials, extends to your honorable body an invitation to attend and participate in the opening ceremonies of the exposition to take place at Chicago on the 3d day of July next, at which time the citizens of Chicago, in conjunction with the exposition management, have determined to celebrate our national independence with imposing ceremonies.

Inasmuch as this is the first exposition of national importance that has been created in this country without financial aid from the national Legislature, we trust you will not hesitate to give the enterprise such recognition as the acceptance of this invitation may imply.

Very respectfully, yours,

T. Z. COWLES,

MALCOM MCNEILL, President.
J. W. RYCKMAN, Manager.

He also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2395) to authorize and empower the Union Pacific Railroad to construct branch roads, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CONGER. By order of the Committee on Commerce I report favorably the bill (H. R. 6979) authorizing the construction of additional light-house districts, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill can not be further proceeded with. It will go on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I ask to have the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can not have it read, it being objected to; it goes on the Calendar, and can be called up after to-day.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose a Senator can ask to have any paper read which he wishes to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that after objection is made the bill can not be read until to-morrow, when it will be in regular order.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar. I am a little surprised that the objection comes from a gentleman representing so many interests in favor of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7471) to provide for the establishment of additional aids to navigation to guide vessels through the channels leading to Pensacola, Fla., to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. From the same committee I report with amendments the bill (H. R. 7633) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouths of the Mississippi River, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1323) providing for the establishment of fog-signal, light-ship, and lights off the mouth of the Mississippi River, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 339) to enable the Light-House Board to increase the number of the light-house districts on the Western rivers, and making an appropriation therefor.

Mr. CONGER. I am also instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 340) to authorize the creation of an additional light-house district, to report it adversely, the subject-matter being embodied in a House bill which I have heretofore reported. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 2704) for the relief of John Little and Hobart Williams; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3642) for the relief of the heirs of Jacob Cramer, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. GRAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 31) for the relief of Warren Mitchell, to report it favorably, and to submit a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Delaware will pardon me. I understood there was to be a minority report in that case. I understand that a majority of the committee favor the report the Senator has made, but it will be more convenient to have the two printed together, and if the Senator will withdraw his report I will send in my minority report in the course of a few days.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon; I understood the minority report was made and signed.

Mr. HOAR. It has not been signed.

Mr. GRAY. It was a misunderstanding on my part.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the majority report can be kept from the Printer. I want the two printed together. That will answer my purpose.

Mr. GRAY. I will withdraw my report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is withdrawn.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2516) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., reported it with amendments.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I wish to say in connection with the report just made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that I am entirely in favor of the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge there in accordance with the report of the engineers, and in favor of repealing the charter already existing. The only difference between myself and the committee was in regard to some recommendations of the engineers as to the piers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back adversely the bill (S. 2515) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Memphis, in the State of Tennessee. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5003) for the relief of Mary E. Casey, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1413) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 5921) granting an increase of pension to John Ryan;

A bill (S. 2598) granting a pension to James Noyes;

A bill (H. R. 6747) granting a pension to Mary A. Thomas; and

A bill (H. R. 1580) for the relief of Emily B. Baker.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Frank W. Tubbesing, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2705) granting a pension to Frank W. Tubbesing; which was read twice by its title.

DEARBORN PARK, CHICAGO.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 925) to grant Dearborn Park, in the city of Chicago, to said city for the use and benefit of public and benevolent institutions, to report it with amendments.

Mr. LOGAN. If there is no objection I ask unanimous consent to take the bill up and act on it now. It will occupy but a moment. I am sure there will be no objection to it with the amendments reported by the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator explain what the bill is?

Mr. LOGAN. Let the bill be read. It will explain itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

Mr. HOAR. There are certain amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the committee will be read.

The amendments were, in line 12, after the word "Chicago," to strike out "and its successors" and insert "without covenant of any kind, express or implied;" in line 15, after the word "Home," to insert the words "of Chicago;" in line 18, after the word "exist," to insert "by or;" in the same line, after the words "account of," to insert "this;" and in the same line, after the words "change of," to insert "the;" so as to read:

That all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a piece or tract of land bounded on the north by the south line of Randolph street, on the east by the west line of Michigan avenue, on the south by the north line of Washington street, and on the west by the east line of an alley known as Dearborn Place, which said tract of land is known as Dearborn Park, in Fort Dearborn addition to Chicago, as subdivided and platted by the Secretary of War in the year 1839, be, and the same are hereby, released, relinquished, and granted to the city of Chicago without covenant of any kind, express or implied, for the use and occupancy by the following public and benevolent institutions, one-third to each: The Chicago Public Library, Soldiers' Home of Chicago, and Chicago Academy of Design: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall deprive the owners of contiguous lots of any valid rights or claims, if any such exist, by or on account of this change of the dedication originally made by the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill:

Nor shall any claim or demand accrue to the said city of Chicago or any person whatsoever by, under, or in consequence of this act: And provided further, That if either of said public uses shall cease, then and thereupon the portion of the land whose use shall cease shall revert to the United States free and discharged of any easement or dedication to public uses whatsoever.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill to change the language and instead of saying "whose use," say "the use of which." I think that grammatical. The word "whose" is hardly correct in that connection.

Mr. HOAR. I am not aware of any reason for preferring one phrase to the other.

Mr. CALL. I understand it to be property, to which the term "whose use" is not applicable. I think the words "to which use" would be better.

Mr. HOAR. It speaks of the institution, of a person.

Mr. LOGAN. Either one is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported to amend the preamble in the second paragraph, after the word "exist," by striking out the word "or" and inserting "so;" so as to read:

Whereas the object and uses for which such dedication was made no longer exist, so that said park can be used, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the preamble as amended.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

J. G. FLOURNOY.

Mr. GEORGE. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7650) to remove the political disabilities of I. G. Flournoy, of Mississippi, to report it favorably with an amendment. I ask for the present consideration of the bill. It will not take a minute to pass it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 3, to strike out "I" and insert "J;" so as to read "J. G. Flournoy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to remove the political disabilities of J. G. Flournoy, of Mississippi."

EULOGIES ON REPRESENTATIVE RANKIN.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 185) for the printing of certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Joseph Rankin, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREELY'S POLAR EXPEDITION REPORT.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for printing Lieutenant Greely's Report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 9, to strike out "3,250" and insert "2,500;" and in line 10 to add the words "and seven hundred and fifty copies for distribution by the Signal Service Bureau;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 4,500 copies, with the necessary illustrations, be printed of the report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, Grinnell Land, by First Lieut. A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, acting signal officer; 1,250 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 750 copies for distribution by the Signal Service Bureau.

Mr. CONGER. Does that reduce the total number to be printed?

Mr. MANDERSON. It does not. It makes the House resolution correspond exactly with the resolution which passed the Senate a few days ago.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that a committee of conference be requested with the House of Representatives on the concurrent resolution and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. MANDERSON, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

DEBATE ON MOTIONS TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the last paragraph of clause 1, Rule XIII, is hereby amended by striking out the words "without debate."

I ask for its immediate consideration. It simply provides for debate on a motion to reconsider.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the rule be read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. FRYE. By the rule as it is now it is provided that a motion to reconsider shall be passed upon without debate. This strikes out the words "without debate," and allows debate on a motion to reconsider, which is highly proper. Those words were put in the rule by inadvertence, undoubtedly.

Mr. BECK. Do you make it privileged?

Mr. FRYE. Not privileged, but debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule will be read as proposed to be amended.

The Chief Clerk read the last clause of the first paragraph of Rule XIII as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Every motion to reconsider shall be decided by a majority vote, and may be laid on the table without affecting the question in reference to which the same is made, which shall be a final disposition of the motion.

Mr. FRYE. It simply leaves it debatable; that is all.

Mr. BECK. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. Two resolutions touching the subject were referred to the Committee on Rules. I report them back, and ask that they lie on the table.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XIII be amended by striking out the words "without debate" in the last sentence of clause 1.

Submitted by Mr. INGALLS April 1.

Resolved, That the last paragraph of the first clause of Rule XII be amended so as to read as follows:

"Any motion to reconsider may be laid on the table without affecting the question in reference to which the same is made, and if laid on the table it shall be a final disposition of the motion."

Submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS June 14.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state to the Senator from Indiana and the Senate that a bill for that general purpose was before the Committee on Public Lands some years ago, and investigation was had there at great length. Although I think myself that the general subject of the McGarrahan claim has been under the jurisdiction of that committee, I shall not now interpose an objection to the bill going to any other committee which the Senator may desire.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the bill go to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and if hereafter the Senator from Kansas thinks that is not the proper designation we can confer together about it.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the river and harbor bill; which, on his request, was read, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

That the sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the improvement of the Wabash River, and to be expended between Vincennes and Terre Haute, Ind.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. On Thursday last the Senate passed the bill (S. 2292) to provide for the settlement of a certain Cherokee claim under the treaty of February 14, 1833, in which there was a mistake of the Printer. I should like to have the bill recalled from the House of Representatives for the purpose of making the correction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill referred to by the Senator from Arkansas will be recalled. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

NATIONAL CEMETERY AT NATCHEZ.

Mr. WALTHALL. On the 18th instant the bill (H. R. 1341) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Natchez, Miss., was passed by the Senate with an amendment. It has been discovered that in the bill as it was returned to the other House there is an error. I ask that the bill be recalled from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

On motion of Mr. GORMAN, it was

CINNABAR AND CLARK'S FORK RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the morning business is closed.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 980) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. MANDERSON. Do I understand that that bill is proposed to be considered at this time?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; at the present time.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not desire to make an objection to the consideration of the bill, but simply to call to the attention of the Senator from South Carolina the absence of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who is interested in the measure.

Mr. PLUMB. He is not absent.

Mr. VEST. I am here.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator from Missouri is here, and I make no further objection, if it is the desire of the Senate to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. DOLPH. I object. I intended to move as soon as the morning business was over that the Senate resume the consideration of the public land bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know that a single objection is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is not in order. The motion is in order at this time to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the bill be taken up, notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. [Putting the question.] The Chair is of the opinion that the noes have it.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 980) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Territories with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That a right of way is hereby granted the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the Territory of Montana, across such portions of the northern border of the Yellowstone National Park as may be necessary to reach, by the nearest practicable route from Cinnabar, the Clark's Fork mining district, in said Territory of Montana, by the way of the Yellowstone River to its junction with the East Fork of said river; thence by the way of said East Fork to the Soda Butte Creek; thence by said creek to the Clark's Fork mining district, upon such location as may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875. Said right of way hereby granted shall be restricted to such limits as are absolutely essential for the road-bed and slopes of cuts and base of fills, except at such points, not nearer than 10 miles from each other, as may be designated by said railroad company for station buildings, depots, side-tracks, turnouts, and water stations, at which points the right of way shall be limited to the actual sites for said buildings, and the limitation for side-tracks or switches shall not exceed in width 60 feet, to cover all trackways, and a length of 500 feet; that the structures erected by said railroad company within the park shall not in any instance include machine shops, repair shops, supply stations, hotels, restaurants, eating-houses, stores, or any building except a depot, including telegraph or telephone office, residence for station agent, and one building for residence of section hands; and said right right of way and locations for depot grounds shall not in any instance include objects designated as natural curiosities or matters of interest to tourists, or be surrounded or inclosed by fences, walls, or hedges that shall obstruct the view of any contiguous objects, or bar the passage to them of pedestrians or vehicles, and no rights of any kind shall vest in said railroad company in or to any part of the right of way herein provided for until plats thereof, made upon actual surveys for the definite location of said railroad, and including the points for station building, depots, side-tracks, turnouts, and water-stations, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior and be duly approved by him. No timber or other materials to be used in the construction of said railroad shall be cut or taken from any portion of the Yellowstone National Park, except such as may be cut or taken within the right of way hereby granted; and the grants hereby made are limited also so as not to include any coal or other mineral found on said right of way; nor shall said company, or its successors, use the property given hereby for any purposes except in the construction and operation of a railroad.

SEC. 2. That none of the shares of the capital stock of the corporation herein named shall be transferable until at least 50 per cent. of the par value thereof shall have been paid in in cash. No bonds shall be issued or mortgages executed for the security thereof by said corporation in an amount exceeding one-half of the sum which its president, treasurer, and chief engineer shall certify, under oath, to the treasurer of the Territory of Montana, has been actually expended, at the time of the issue of such bonds, upon the railroad so to be constructed; and any false swearing in the matter shall be perjury. The whole amount of bonds outstanding at any one time shall not exceed one-half of the actual cost of the construction and equipment of such railroad. The provisions of this section relating to the transfer of stock and the issue of bonds shall be applicable to any corporation to which the corporation named in this act shall convey, or attempt to convey, its franchises, or rights, or property, prior to the final completion of said road.

SEC. 3. That all charges for transportation of either freight or passengers over said railroad shall be reasonable, and without discrimination as to persons, shippers, or consignees. No rebates or drawbacks of any kind or nature shall be allowed, directly or indirectly, to any patron of the railroad, nor shall there be any unjust discrimination in the facilities afforded shippers or consignees at any station on the line of said railroad; and as to these and all kindred matters Congress reserves the right to make all necessary regulations as to said railroad, in consideration of this grant, as well as to alter or amend this act.

SEC. 4. That if said road shall not be constructed and in running order within three years from and after the passage of this act, the right of way hereby granted shall thereupon be forfeited, and this condition is expressly understood to be a condition-precedent as to all rights granted hereby; and in case of a breach of the condition of this section, all rights granted hereby shall revert to the United States by operation of this provision, without the necessity of any action by Congress: Provided, That the grant hereby shall not be held or construed as exclusive, so as to prevent the allowance of the locating other roads along the valleys or route adopted under this act, under such grants and regulations as Congress may make and provide and the courts equitably administer.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, if I can secure the attention of the Senate for a very few moments I should like to give my reasons, and very earnestly, why this bill should not become a law.

To those Senators, if there be any such here, who believe that the Yellowstone Park should be destroyed and cease to exist I have no argument to make. I am very well aware that it is popular to assert in this country that nothing should exist in which there is not money, and that any one who proposes to preserve the great National Park in its original grandeur and beauty and to preserve the game, which has almost ceased to exist upon this continent, is taunted with æstheticism and is sneered at as behind the proper spirit and ideas of the age.

I am not ashamed for myself to say that my life has been largely devoted to field sports, that I have lived a large portion of my time in the woods and forests and mountains and upon the rivers of the great West. I know whereof I speak when I say to-day, without any other interest or motive under heaven than that of an American citizen and Senator, that the construction of this railroad is the destruction of that park. To those who think that Mammoth Cave should be turned into a subterranean storehouse for mercantile purposes, that the Falls of Niagara should be used with their water-power to turn a mill, that the wonderful geysers of the Yellowstone Park should be devoted to laundry purposes and leased out to Chinamen in order to wash dirty linen, to such persons I have and can have no argument and no appeal to make. But to those who sympathize with me in the purpose to preserve one spot at least on this continent from the rush and greed and avarice of the age, one spot in which nature shall exist as it was originally, in which the great game, the elk and the bison and the black-tailed deer, shall always be found for our children and our children's children, to such Senators I now appeal most earnestly against this bill.

I know, Mr. President, that it is said this railroad is necessary in order to reach mines. I shall not stop to discuss the value of those mines, because, like all mining property, their value is prospective and in the future. They may amount to a great deal, and they may amount to nothing, with the chances largely in favor of the latter proposition. I solemnly assert my opinion, based upon close examination and without prejudice, that this railroad is not proposed to be built to reach any mines, that it is not intended for any such purpose, and I propose to show, if not by actual demonstration at least by probable facts, that my assertion is correct.

These mines are represented to be of large value; thousands of dollars it is said are invested in them; and what proof have we presented here from the stockholders of these mining companies that the proposed route through the park is the only practicable line to the North Pacific Railroad? I call attention to the fact, and I defy contradiction when I say, in the presence of the enormous valuation upon this mining property, with thousands of tons of ore, as General Anderson says, dumped out already waiting for the cars to carry it to the reduction works in Montana, with stock companies organized for working the mines, that no preliminary survey has ever been made of any route to these mines.

Only a few hundred dollars would have been necessary to make this survey; and yet with this enormous mining property upon their hands these gentlemen have not seen fit or proper to make a survey, for it would be ridiculous to argue that they had not the means to make these preliminary surveys in order to ascertain by what route they could most cheaply and rapidly approach this property.

There are three routes proposed. One of them is the Boulder route outside of the park, which is perfectly practicable. I have here the letter of an engineer officer, who has been over every foot of it, declaring that the road can be built. It is a little farther, a little longer distance, but entirely practicable; and this officer, as will be seen by his letter, traveled over the whole Boulder route, not one foot of which is inside of the Yellowstone National Park.

But without preliminary surveys, a thing unheard of in such an enterprise, a bill is presented here session after session and pressed upon Congress to run this railroad up the Yellowstone River to the East Fork of that river, and then up Soda Butte Creek, going through the loveliest portion of the Yellowstone National Park, and the only portion, as I shall show by evidence beyond question, in which the game congregate during the winter months. In the summer the large game of the Yellowstone can go where they please without let or hinderance; but in the winter they come into this identical region, the loveliest portion as I have said of that great park on the Yellowstone River and Soda Butte Creek, and there and there only they have a range during those winter months in which the range is most necessary to them.

Why have the projectors of this enterprise had no preliminary survey of the route made? Why is it that they do not bring to Congress the best proof that the nature of the case is susceptible of—the reports of engineers, from practical observation, who can testify to Congress that this is the cheapest and most practicable route between Cinnabar and the Clark's Fork mines?

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question, if he will yield to me.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask him if in his experience he has ever known a survey to have been made before a charter has been secured?

Mr. VEST. This is a case in which the whole argument turns upon whether a charter shall be granted upon this particular route or not. If there were a proposition here for a charter between certain points on the most practicable route there would be something pertinent in the inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina; but here is a proposition fixing the route, and that is the remarkable fact to which I point to-day. They do not want a survey; they do not propose to have one, because perhaps a survey would defeat their object, which is to get into the Yellowstone National Park, not to get to these mines, but to run up this valley of the Yellowstone, up to Soda Butte Springs, the most wonderful springs in that country, at which point they propose to build a depot. The real purpose is to construct a railroad to carry passengers, not ore. There is the money in this enterprise, and not in going to the mines, in which they say they have already ore dumped out ready for transportation. I know whereof I speak from personal observation. I have been in that park and traveled over this identical territory, and I am as thoroughly convinced of the truth of what I say as if it were a mathematical proposition.

I know great exertions have been made to pass this bill. I know that a former officer of the Interior Department has been lobbying Congress three sessions to pass it, and he is here again now for the same purpose. I know that Senators, myself included, have been attacked and besmirched in the public press, and we have been branded by the assertion that we were the tools of the Northern Pacific Railroad. I assert here to-day, using only such language as this presence admits, that the assertion that I have any other object, direct or indirect, than that which is proper to a citizen of this country and a Senator representing a sovereign State, is so utterly and infamously false, that the wretch who makes it is unworthy of credence from any gentleman. No man connected with the Northern Pacific Railroad Company has ever approached me or dared to do so. If the Northern Pacific Railroad has any interest in this matter, it is to construct this road because it is a branch running directly to their main line. How could the Northern Pacific Railroad have any other interest?

I speak only in the way of conjecture, because I assert that no agent, no officer, no one connected with that road has ever approached me in any way. I mention this not from any personal feeling, for I know that when any public man stands in the way of one of these speculative enterprises the first thing is to cajole him or buy him, and if that can not be done the next thing is to destroy him. I do not expect to be personally exempt from the ordinary fate of public life, and I mention this only to emphasize my statement that these extraordinary means to pass this most extraordinary bill with a route already fixed upon the face of it come and come alone from the idea that they want not to carry out the ore from these mines but to carry passengers into the park.

Mr. President, I said, and I said it deliberately, that the construction of this railroad meant the destruction of that park, and I repeat it distinctly. I do not mean to say, that the construction of this railroad will immediately frighten away all the game from the park and burn the forests and close up the geysers hermetically; but I do mean to say that the construction of this or any other railroad within its territorial limits breaks down the purpose and object for which that park was created and it ceases to be a park.

The original idea was that this National Park should remain in its original condition exempt from the ordinary mercantile and commercial interests of this great country. Once let in this railroad, the agent of commerce, and you destroy the park. Afterward the number of railroads that go into the park amounts simply to nothing, for the idea upon which the park was based will have been destroyed and destroyed forever. If this railroad be constructed in the most beautiful portion of the park it will be a very few months until another bill will be proposed to construct a railroad from Green River upon the Union Pacific up to Lewis Lake and connecting with the Northern Pacific. Three years ago when I passed on horseback along this route the survey had been made up to the park, and I saw the pegs which the engineers had driven for the projected road of which I now speak. A bill was pending here in the last Congress for the construction of this road by Lewis Lake, pressed I do not know in what interest, but I very much suspect in the same interest as the bill now pending before this body. Construct this road, and then road after road will demand admission from every direction into the Yellowstone Park, and that is the end of the idea upon which it was originally organized.

Mr. President, I shall indulge in no rhetoric in speaking of the wonderful scenery, of the geysers, of the Yellowstone Falls. I shall leave that to others if they see proper to address the Senate on a subject which admits of the largest amount of descriptive power without going beyond the truth. But leaving aside the æsthetical idea of a park for the people, for the preservation of the great game of this continent, and appealing only to the mercenary idea, let me say to the Senate that the construction of this railroad means the destruction of the timber upon the headwaters of the Missouri River, thereby affecting the whole southern country to the mouth of the Mississippi. It goes without saying that the existence of those forests to-day is the most potent agency toward preventing overflows in the lower and southern country. The forests in their primeval condition, with their ferns and mosses and leaves and verdure, absorb the heavy and enormous rains which periodically fall in that portion of our country and prevent their sweeping down over a bald surface until they press to satiety the lower rivers and cause the overflows which are so destructive to property in some of the Southern States.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I ask the Senator what is the proposed length of this road in the park?

Mr. VEST. There is no survey, as I have said; but the accounts as to distance differ. My own personal knowledge leads me to say that this road will run from 60 to 65 miles inside the National Park. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] says no. Here is the evidence so complete and conclusive that no human being can doubt it. Here is the testimony of General Sheridan, and of Mr. W. Hallett Phillips and an officer of the Geological Survey, Mr. Hague, all of whom make substantially the same statement.

It has been said—and I will read these statements at leisure if any Senator desires to hear them or I will have them read—it has been said by some of these witnesses that the distance is 46 to 50 miles; but I assert from what I know of the country between Cinnabar, on the route proposed, up the Yellowstone River, and then up the East Fork, and then up Soda Butte Creek to the Clark's Fork mines, that it is nearer 65 than 46 miles.

Mr. INGALLS. Do you mean 65 miles south of the northern boundary?

Mr. VEST. I mean 65 miles on this proposed route.

Mr. INGALLS. Not 65 miles south of the northern boundary of the park?

Mr. VEST. No; the most extreme point south of the northern boundary is about 11 miles; that is, a direct line from the northern boundary of the park to the most extreme point on this proposed route; but I am speaking now of the longitudinal distance from where it enters the park on the north near Cinnabar, which is the terminus of the branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad nearest the park, up the Yellowstone River to its eastern fork and the Soda Butte Creek, and then up Soda Butte Creek to the Clark's Fork mines. That I say is 65 miles, or in that vicinity.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but as this subject is somewhat new to me, I should like to have his comment on this part of the report accompanying the bill. The report says:

This company was organized under the laws of the Territory of Montana to construct a railroad from Cinnabar, the terminus of the Livingston branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad, on the Yellowstone River, about 5 miles north of the northern boundary of the park, to reach Clark's Forks mining district, in Southern Montana, lying a few miles north of the northeast corner of the park.

Each end of this road according to this report is outside the park.

Mr. VEST. That is true. But if the Senator from Indiana will simply look at the map of the Yellowstone Park which I have here, and which has the railway marked on it, he will see exactly where that route runs.

For General Sherman I have very great regard, and however much we may differ from him in regard to his conclusions he is always frank and honest in their utterance. When General Sherman was in the park, the year before I was there the first time, he came to the conclusion that the game could never be preserved in that park, and that the idea that the great game of this country, the bison, the elk, and the black-tail deer, could be preserved at all was simply Utopian and ideal; but to one who has been accustomed to field sports and the habits of game it is not difficult to conceive how a preserve could be created with even imperfect guardianship which would very soon induce the large game to congregate there and consider themselves safe from all assault. Instinct far surpasses intellect when we consider the wonderful intelligence of animals in selecting localities in which they are safe from the pursuit of the huntsman.

Let there be, as there has been upon the Potomac River, a preserve like that of the Woodmont Club, with 10,000 acres of land only, and with only three gamekeepers. In less than eighteen months after that preserve was created the deer from all the adjacent mountains, finding this a comparatively safe refuge, when started in from their covers immediately made this preserve the objective point, until to-day there are more deer found upon that 10,000 acres, I undertake to say, than on any other 10,000 acres in the Eastern States.

Now, let me read, if the Senate pleases, while upon this idea, a letter coming from a practical hunter and woodsman, whose opinion and testimony are worth all the rhetoric and all the appeals that may be made in this Chamber within the next five hours. When in the Yellowstone Park I made the acquaintance of Mr. Hofer, one of those men fast disappearing now from the frontier, who live in the forest—men who, like Daniel Boone and Kenton, when their cattle mingled with those of a neighbor 25 miles distant, thought the towns and cities were encroaching upon the domain which they loved so well, and immediately moved farther west. This man Hofer lives in the mountains. He knows by instinct almost equal to that of the animals themselves their habits. Here is his testimony in regard to the result of even the imperfect guardianship which we have been enabled under an act of Congress to put over this splendid park. Mark you, it is a part of 3,300 square miles, with such rivers and mountains and lakes and waterfalls, to say nothing of the wonderful geysers, as the whole world beside does not furnish. Mr. Hofer, writing to Mr. Hallett Phillips, says, speaking of the proposed railroad:

> The country which they propose to go through is about all the ground that is used as a winter range or feeding-ground for elk, bison, and antelope within the limits of the park. If it is cut off and a railroad run through, you may as well kill off the game at once, for it will be driven off. The idea that teams, &c., frighten off the game is foolish. All winter, elk have fed in sight and close to the wagon-road. I have the Government stock now on the East Fork of Gardiner. Often the elk come down among the mules and horses and feed with them. All winter, elk, antelope, and mountain sheep have been with our stock. It is the shooting and loud noises that scare off the game. A thousand teams would be hauling freight to Cook all winter and the game never leave on their account; so long as they do not shoot at them, so long will the game have no fear of teams. It is in winter that the game wants to be protected. In summer they can go anywhere, but in winter there is only a small portion of the park where they can stay. The railroad would take that from them. I have been here long enough to know how it will work. All of you who are interested in the park know it only in summer. You should know that the snow is so deep in winter, through the park, that game must come out to live.

He then shows that the country through which the railroad would penetrate is the only locality where the game comes out to feed. He concludes by saying that the objection to a railroad across the Snow Mountains on account of the depth of snow is untenable, that all the narrow-gauge railroads in Colorado run through more snow than ever falls in the Snow Mountains; the snowfall in Colorado being from 5 to 10 feet more.

Mr. President, that letter may be roughly written, but it comes from a huntsman, a man who has lived in those mountains for years, who has had charge of the Government stock during the last winter, who testifies now that the elk, and the antelope, and the bison, and the deer come down to feed with his stock. That is worth all the declarations of these speculators that could be piled on these tables until they reached the ceiling.

It is said here that the wagon-roads scare off the game. Under the present administration in that park the game has increased and more than doubled within the last two years; a change for the better which is almost beyond description. But now if this railroad is constructed all that has been done for the preservation of the game goes for nothing. Every Senator who has been in the vicinity of that park or within its territorial limits knows that for twelve and fourteen and fifteen months at a time not one single drop of rain falls.

In traveling on horseback from the Union Pacific to the Northern Pacific Railroad, as I did three years ago, we traveled for days over fallen timber intertwined, thrown there by the fires which originated from a single spark, perhaps from the carelessness of some camper or hunter who had left his camp-fire burning and gone on his next day's journey. During these terrible seasons of drought the forests become like tinder, and a single spark starts a conflagration which destroys hundreds of miles of magnificent timber. Is it necessary for me to call the attention of the Senate to the danger that would be a thousand times multiplied by the construction of a railroad through such a country as that?

Mark you, sir, this proposed route goes up the Yellowstone River through the most beautiful forests in that whole park. It is almost impossible now, with ten assistant superintendents, all mountaineers, to keep the fires from destroying all the timber on the headwaters of the Missouri and Columbia Rivers. Nor are we without a preliminary survey under the influence—I will not say the influence, but under the persistent labor of these speculators and their attorneys—to put this railroad through that park, have this timber destroyed, and give up the idea upon which the park was originally constructed, and for what? Upon the assertion that they desire to reach some undeveloped mines of enormous wealth, according to their statement, and yet they are not willing to furnish fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars with which to make a survey of a route to them. I must be excused if I doubt the statement that they desire to carry out the ore; I must be excused if I further doubt the statement that there is no other route by which they can reach those mines. I have here a letter from Lieutenant Bailey, of the United States Army:

> HEADQUARTERS FIFTH UNITED STATES INFANTRY,
> Fort Keogh, Mont., May 31, 1884.
> SENATOR: I am in receipt of a letter from Colonel Gregory, of General Sheridan's staff, informing me that you are interested in affairs concerning the Yellowstone Park and desirous of obtaining information relative to the practicability of building a railroad from the Northern Pacific Railroad into Cook City—
> Which is the Clark's Fork mining district—
> by way of Boulder Creek—
> That does not touch the Yellowstone Park at all—
> In reply thereto I have the honor to inform you that in the fall of 1878 I marched up that creek to near its head with wagons and had scouts made from my camp to the head of the creek. From recollection—my notes having been lost or destroyed—I am of the opinion that a railroad can be built up Boulder Creek to its head and that a pass can be found over the divide through which it would be practicable to build a railroad. After crossing the divide by skirting along the foot of the mountains a gradual descent into Cook City can be obtained. From about 6 miles above the Natural Bridge dense timber will be encountered on Boulder Creek, but a roadway could easily be opened and the timber utilized in many ways.
> My opinion is based not only upon my own observations and the reports of my scouts, but also upon the statement of my guide, who had hunted through that region for years, that if it became necessary for me to go into the park by that route he could take me there by crossing the divide at the head of Boulder Creek, and then down either Hell Roaring or Soda Butte Creek, the latter affording the most easy passage of the two. I was informed before going into Boulder Creek by men who claimed to have a thorough knowledge of the Snow Mountains that there were only two passes over them, one by Boulder Creek, the other by Clark's Fork, and the passes shown on the accompanying map confirm their statements. I return herewith the map sent me by Colonel Gregory with my proposed route marked thereon in red ink. If more definite and accurate information is desired I am willing to make a survey of the route. Trusting that information contained herein may of service to you,

There is the statement of an Army officer who has been over the Boulder route and who says it is practicable for the construction of a railroad.

But, Mr. President, there is a feature in this bill to which I ask the attention of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator a question before he proceeds further?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask whether this bill is recommended either by the Interior Department or by the War Department?

Mr. VEST. It is not; and upon the contrary the Secretary of the Interior has laid before the Senate in a report here which covers every detail of this measure his opposition to it and his reason for that opposition.

I am authorized to say that the Secretary of War is opposed to it, and the commanding general of the Army, General Sheridan, who is familiar with that country and has been over it time and time again, is also opposing it, and his letter is here before the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it should be stated in that connection that the present Secretary of the Interior as a Senator and a member of the Committee on Railroads reported in favor of this identical bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I see by the original act that the Secretary of the Interior is charged with the control and care of this park.

Mr. VEST. He is. The Secretary of the Interior has control of this park under the law.

In reply to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] I have simply to remark that while the Secretary of the Interior was a member of that committee as a Senator, I undertake to say now, for I have it from him, that he knew nothing about this bill, that he paid no attention to it, that there were personal and family circumstances then existing which prevented his attention to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I am only governed by the record.

Mr. VEST. I will explain that record, and I put against that record the official statement of the Secretary of the Interior to-day, when he is acting as Secretary of the Interior, and by virtue of that office is custodian of this park. He opposes this measure in every way possible. I undertake to say that every man who knows anything of the park and is interested in its preservation is opposed to it. Mr. W. Hallett Phillips, who was sent there as agent of the Interior Department, gives his reasons in opposition to it. Mr. Hague, whom I met in the park as a member of the Geological Survey, gives his reasons at length against it. The park superintendent is against it; and old Jack Barronet, the father of the guides in the West, has written me in opposition to this railroad. I stand here to-day and say from my own personal knowledge of that country and of the park that the construction of this railroad is absolutely the destruction of the park itself.

Now, Mr. President, a few words as to the extraordinary provisions of this bill. Section 4 provides:

That if said road shall not be constructed and in running order within three years from and after the passage of this act, the right of way hereby granted shall thereupon be forfeited, and this condition is expressly understood to be a condition precedent as to all rights granted hereby; and in case of a breach of the condition of this section, all rights granted hereby shall revert to the United States by operation of this provision, without the necessity of any action by Congress: Provided, That the grant hereby shall not be held or construed as exclusive, so as to prevent the allowance of the locating other roads along the valley or route adopted under this act, under such grants and regulations as Congress may make and provide and the courts equitably administer.

Why is that provision put in this bill? Why was it necessary to suggest that other roads might be constructed along this same river? Why is the idea sedulously inculcated in this provision of the bill that this shall not be the only railroad that goes into the park?

As I said before, there was a bill pending here in the last Congress for the construction of a road from Green River on the Union Pacific up by Lewis Lake to Cinnabar. That bill has not been presented at this session. It is held in abeyance and reserve; but just so soon as the present bill is enacted into a law, this other set of speculators will come to Congress, and we are estopped from denying them the right to enter the park because we have given the privilege to the gentlemen now asking it. If we once break up the idea of this being a park exclusively that is the end of the act of 1873, and for myself I shall have no more concern with that park or anything pertaining to it.

Mr. President, I have spoken earnestly. I have no interest in this matter except as a citizen and a Senator. I have no feeling except the feeling of one who knows the truth of what he says and desires to impress it upon his fellow Senators. I impute no motive other than a proper one to anybody. I indignantly repudiate the ascription of any improper motive to myself.

I do not propose to urge upon the Senate that they shall interfere with the commerce of the country, that they shall break up the great railroad system of the country in order to preserve the wild game of the West, or in order to preserve the geysers and lakes and waterfalls and mountains of that wonderful region.

I do not believe this railroad is necessary. I believe it is certain that the real purpose is not put upon the face of this bill. It was said two years ago when this bill was first brought here that they were willing to put a provision in it, and the then Commissioner of Railroads, who was a stockholder in the mines, stated to various Senators, myself included, that they were willing to put in a provision that nothing but freight should be carried upon the cars of this projected company. But, sir, the bill is changed; it now provides for freight and passengers, with depots at each 10 miles. It proposes to run to the Soda Butte Springs, the most wonderful mineral springs in the whole of the Western States and Territories. It is a passenger road. The idea is to get into the park, and then when the main line is constructed up the Yellowstone River it follows as a corollary, as a logical sequence, that branches are to be constructed and run down to the geysers, to the Yellowstone Lake, and to the falls of the Yellowstone.

Once put a railroad of that sort in the park, and I for one will vote to throw the whole park into the public domain and let the first and fastest man enter Old Faithful for laundry purposes and take the great falls of the Yellowstone for a mill. I would not give one farthing for that park if this bill becomes a law. I would not entertain the idea of wasting one hour of my time hereafter upon the park if this legistion is once had and this entering step is once taken by this Congress.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am very sorry that I can not sympathize entirely with my friend the honorable Senator from Missouri in the esthetic view he takes of this case.

Mr. VEST. I am past that word "esthetic."

Mr. BUTLER. I say it with all respect. Of course while I have great admiration and respect for that Senator, I do not sympathize with him. He has had the good fortune to have hunted in that great park of the West, and fished in its streams and enjoyed its magnificent scenery. I have never had that opportunity, and, as my friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] says, very few of my constituents will ever have that opportunity, and I do not know but that about the best disposition which can be made of that park would be to do as my friend has suggested, throw it open for settlement under the land laws of the United States. I think perhaps that would be about as well as anything else. I agree entirely with General Sherman about that, whose letter I will read. I know nothing about this railroad bill except such information as I have acquired by reason of my position upon the Committee on Territories. The bill came to the Committee on Territories, why I confess I do not understand. It had before had the unanimous report of the Railroad Committee of this body, and I suppose I may refer to the other House, because their report is before us, and it has had a unanimous report from the committee of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pause to enable the Chair to receive a message from the President of the United States.

[Several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 19th instant, approved the act (S. 973) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Sarah P. McKean, of Marion, Linn County, Iowa.

The message also announced that the President had, on the 21st instant, approved and signed the act (S. 200) to authorize the purchase of the Aqueduct Bridge, or the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, D. C.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At 2 o'clock the unfinished business comes up. There is some morning business yet to be disposed of, and the Chair asks the Senator from South Carolina to yield so that it may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall ask after that has been announced by the Chair that the consideration of this bill be proceeded with until we have concluded it to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6395) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr LOGAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. LOGAN, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives concurring in some and non-concurring in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6392) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have a conference now?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DAYTON, OHIO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 856) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Dayton, Ohio, which was, after the word "dollars," in line 10, to insert:

Nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MAHONE. There is no objection to that amendment. I move that the Senate concur in it.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF JOHN M. ROBESON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 209) for the relief of the legal representatives of John M. Robeson, deceased, which was, in line 4, to strike out "one thousand" and insert "five hundred;" so that the bill will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the legal representatives of John M. Robeson, deceased, the sum of $500; and this amount to be in full satisfaction of all claims of said estate against the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HOAR, Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, and Mr. GRAY were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 834) for the relief of John A. London;

A bill (H. R. 6983) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Twelfth Michigan Volunteer Infantry dishonorably discharged under special orders 92, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, dated March 1, 1866; and

A bill (H. R. 1657) for the relief of Patrick S. Doig.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 3504) to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes, relating to inspectors of hulls and boilers; and

A bill (H. R. 8973) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Dubuque, in the State of Iowa.

The bill (H. R. 4335) making an appropriation to continue the construction of the public building at Clarksburg, W. Va., and changing the limit of cost thereof, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (H. R. 5652) for the relief of James W. Goodrich was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE IN GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office, returned from the House to the Senate in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment to that bill and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

CINNABAR AND CLARK'S FORK RAILROAD.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator from South Carolina will yield a moment I wish to ask the Chair if we lay aside this bill on reaching 2 o'clock, what place it will hold to-morrow morning, whether it will be the unfinished business after the routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no such thing as unfinished business in the morning hour. The bill would be subject to be called up by a vote of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. Subject to be called up as it was this morning by a vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. Then——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina, being in favor of this bill myself, and the unfinished business being a bill that several of us would like to have considered to-day, that if it meets his views he leave the further consideration of this bill without any motion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill takes its place upon the Calendar subject to be called up.

Mr. CONGER. Until after the morning business to-morrow, and then take it up again as was done this morning by a vote.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire what the unfinished business is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is called the pre-emption law repeal bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no desire to antagonize the regular order, and I therefore yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan. I simply desire to have this bill considered and disposed of, now that it is under consideration. I am no more interested than other Senators. If it is agreeable to the majority of the Senate that we shall lay aside this bill and take up the unfinished business I shall acquiesce, with the understanding, however, that we shall take this bill up to-morrow morning after the regular morning business. I shall be glad to have some understanding of that kind.

Mr. CONGER. Let the Senator give notice that after the regular morning business to-morrow he will move to take it up.

Mr. BUTLER. I give that notice now.

Mr. VEST. It can only come up by a vote.

Mr. CONGER. But the Senator has had his say and the rest of us want ours.

Mr. VEST. That is all right.

Mr. BUTLER. I submit to the Senator from Missouri that it is but just that the rest of us should have the same right that he has had in the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business now comes up.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say before the subject of the Cinnabar Railroad passes from the consideration of the Senate that I supposed there was an understanding that the pre-emption repeal bill should be taken up and disposed of to the exclusion of all other matters, and I hope that will be done, unless it can be finished to-day, as I trust it can be; but if not, I trust the Senator from South Carolina will allow the railroad bill to pass by until the pending order of business shall be disposed of. I think we can easly dispose of the Senator's bill before the close of the session.

Mr. BUTLER. I, of course, have no more control over it than any other Senator, but I should be very glad to have it discussed in the morning hour at least. However, we can settle that to-morrow morning.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that on Wednesday next, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration the report of the conference committee on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

ELIZABETH S. DE KRAFFT—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 2223, entitled "An act granting a pension to Elizabeth S. De Krafft."

My objection to this bill is that it is of no possible advantage to the beneficiary therein mentioned. It directs that her name be placed upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws. The effect of such legislation would be to permit Mrs. De Krafft to draw a pension at the rate of $30 each month from the date of the approval of the bill.

On the 26th day of February, 1886, under the provisions of the general pension law, she was allowed a pension of this exact sum; but the payments were to date from November 10, 1885.

I am so thoroughly tired of disapproving gifts of public money to individuals who in my view have no right or claim to the same, notwithstanding apparent Congressional sanction, that I interpose with a feeling of relief a veto in a case where I find it unnecessary to determine the merits of the application.

In speaking of the promiscuous and ill-advised grants of pensions which have lately been presented to me for approval, I have spoken of their "apparent Congressional sanction," in recognition of the fact that a large proportion of these bills have never been submitted to a majority of either branch of Congress, but are the result of nominal sessions held for the express purpose of their consideration and attended by a small minority of the members of the respective Houses of the legislative branch of Government.

Thus in considering these bills I have not felt that I was aided by the deliberate judgment of the Congress; and when I have deemed it my duty to disapprove many of the bills presented, I have hardly regarded my action as a dissent from the conclusions of the people's representatives.

I have not been insensible to the suggestions which should influence every citizen, either in private station or official place, to exhibit not only a just but a generous appreciation of the services of our country's defenders. In reviewing the pension legislation presented to me many bills have been approved upon the theory that every doubt should be resolved in favor of the proposed beneficiary. I have not, however, been able to entirely divest myself of the idea that the public money appropriated for pensions is the soldiers' fund, which should be devoted to the indemnification of those who in the defense of the Union and in the nation's service have worthily suffered, and who in the day of their dependence, resulting from such suffering, are entitled to the benefactions of their Government. This reflection lends to the bestowal of pensions a kind of sacredness which invites the adoption of such principles and regulations as will exclude perversion as well as insure a liberal and generous application of grateful and benevolent designs. Heedlessness and a disregard of the principle which underlies the granting of pensions is unfair to the wounded, crippled soldier who is honored in the just recognition of his Government. Such a man should never find himself side by side on the pension-roll with those who have been tempted to attribute the natural ills to which humanity is heir to service in the Army. Every relaxation of principle in the granting of pensions invites applications without merit and encourages those who for gain urge honest men to become dishonest. Thus is the demoralizing lesson taught the people that as against the public Treasury the most questionable expedients are allowable.

During the present session of Congress four hundred and ninety-three special pension bills have been submitted to me, and I am advised that one hundred and eleven more have received the favorable action of both Houses of Congress and will be presented within a day or two, making over six hundred of these bills which have been passed up to this time during the present session, nearly three times the number passed at any entire session since the year 1861.

With the Pension Bureau, fully equipped and regulated by the most liberal rules, in active operation, supplemented in its work by constant special legislation, it certainly is not unreasonable to suppose that in all the years that have elapsed since the close of the war a majority of the meritorious claims for pension have been presented and determined.

I have now more than one hundred and thirty of these bills before me awaiting executive action. It will be impossible to bestow upon them the examination they deserve, and many will probably become operative which should be rejected.

In the mean time I venture to suggest the significance of the startling increase in this kind of legislation and the consequences involved in its continuance.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 21, 1886.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the message of the President just read lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MARGARET D. MARCHAND—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return herewith Senate bill No. 226, entitled "An act granting a pension to Margaret D. Marchand," without approval.

The beneficiary named in this bill is the widow of John B. Marchand, who entered the United States Navy in 1828, who was promoted to the rank of commodore in 1866, and who was placed upon the retired-list in 1870. He died in August, 1875, of heart disease.

His widow filed an application for pension in 1883, claiming that his fatal disease was caused by exposure and exertion in the service during the war of the rebellion. The application was rejected because of the inability to furnish evidence to prove that the death had any relation to the naval service of the deceased.

I am unable to see how any other conclusion could have been reached. The information furnished by the report of the committee to whom this bill was referred, and derived from other data before me, absolutely fails to connect the death of Commodore Marchand with any incident of his naval service.

This officer was undoubtedly brave and efficient, rendering his country valuable service. But it does not appear to have been of so distinguished a character, nor are the circumstances of his widow alleged to be such, as to render a gratuity justifiable.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 19, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will lie on the table.

THOMAS S. HOPKINS—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I hereby return without my approval Senate bill No. 183, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas S. Hopkins, late of Company C, Sixteenth Maine Volunteers."

This soldier was enrolled in the Army June 2, 1862, and discharged June 30, 1865. He was sent to the Government hospital September 20, 1863, and thereupon transferred to the invalid corps.

He filed his declaration for a pension in November, 1880, alleging that while in the service he contracted malarial fever and chronic diarrhea, and was seized with convulsions, suffering from great general debility.

A pension of $50 a month was granted to him in June, 1881, dating from the time of filing his application, which sum he has been receiving up to the present time.

This bill proposes to remove the limitation fixed by the law of 1879 prescribing the date prior to which an application for pension must be filed in order to entitle the claimant to draw the pension allowed from the time of his discharge from the service.

If this bill should become a law, it would entitle the claimant to about $9,000 of back pension. This is claimed upon the ground that the soldier was so sick from the time of the passage of the act creating the limitation up to the date allowed him to avail himself of the privileges of the act that he could not file his claim.

I think the limitation thus fixed a very wise one, and that it should not, in fairness to other claimants, be relaxed for causes not mentioned in the statute, nor should the door be opened to applications of this kind.

The beneficiary named in this bill had fifteen years after the accruing of his claim and before it is alleged that he was incapacitated within which he might have filed his application and entitled himself to the back pension now applied for.

The facts here presented come so far short of furnishing a satisfactory excuse for his delay that, in my judgment, the discrimination asked in his favor should not be granted.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 19, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will lie on the table.

CORNELIA R. SCHENCK—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I hereby return without approval Senate bill No. 1584, entitled "An act for the relief of Cornelia R. Schenck."

It is proposed by this bill to grant a pension to Mrs. Schenck as the widow of Daniel F. Schenck, who entered the military service of the United States in August, 1861, and was mustered out October 21, 1864.

The record of his service contains no mention of any disability; he died in December, 1875, of a disease called gastro-enteritis, which, being interpreted, seems to denote "inflammation of the stomach and small intestines." So far as the facts are made to appear, the soldier, neither during the term of his service nor during the eleven years he lived after his discharge, made any claim of any disability.

The claim of his widow was filed in the Pension Bureau in 1885, ten years after her husband's death, and is still undetermined.

The fact that her application is still pending in that bureau is sufficient reason why this bill should not become a law.

A better reason is based upon the entire lack of any facts shown to exist which entitle the beneficiary named to a pension.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 21, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will lie on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 763, entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa."

The report of the committee of the House of Representatives to whom this bill was referred states that by the census of 1880 the population of Sioux City was nearly 8,000, and that by other enumerations since made its population would seem to exceed 23,000. It is further stated in the report that for the accommodation of this population the city contains 393 brick and 2,984 frame buildings.

It seems to me that in the consideration of the merits of this bill the necessities of the Government should control the question, and that it should be decided as a business proposition depending upon the needs of a Government building at the point proposed in order to do the Government work.

This greatly reduces the value of statistics showing population, extent of business, prospective growth, and matters of that kind, which, though exceedingly interesting, do not always demonstrate the necessity of the expenditure of a large sum of money for a public building.

I find upon examination that United States courts are sometimes held at Sioux City, but that they have been thus far held in the county court-house without serious inconvenience and without any expense to the Government. There are actually no other Federal officers there for whom the Government in any view should provide accommodations, except the postmaster. The post-office is now located in a building rented by the Government until the 1st day of January, 1889, at the rate of $2,200 per annum.

By the last report of the Supervising Architect it appears that on October 1, 1885, there were eighty new public buildings in course of construction, and that the amount expended thereon during the preceding year was nearly two and a half millions of dollars, while large appropriations are asked to be expended on these buildings during the current year.

In my judgment the number of public buildings should not at this time be increased unless a greater public necessity exists therefor than is apparent in this case.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 19, 1886.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that that message be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ZANESVILLE, OHIO—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 206, entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Zanesville, Ohio."

No Federal courts are held at Zanesville, and there are no Government officers located there who should be provided for at the public expense, except the postmaster.

So far as I am informed the patrons of the post-office are fairly well accommodated in a building which is rented by the Government at the rate of $800 per annum; and though the postmaster naturally certifies that he and his fourteen employés require much more spacious surroundings, I have no doubt he and they can be induced to continue to serve the Government in its present quarters.

The buildings now in process of construction, numbering eighty, involving constant supervision, are all the building projects which the Government ought to have on hand at one time, unless a very palpable necessity exists for an increase in the number. The multiplication in these structures involves not only the appropriations made for their completion, but great expense in their care and preservation thereafter.

While a fine Government building is a desirable ornament to any town or city, and while the securing of an appropriation therefor is often considered as an illustration of zeal and activity in the interest of a constituency, I am of the opinion that the expenditure of public money for such a purpose should depend upon the necessity of such a building for public uses.

In the case under consideration I have no doubt the Government can be well accommodated for some time to come in all its business relations with the people of Zanesville by renting quarters, at less expense than the annual cost of maintaining the proposed new building after its completion.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 19, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 38,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1884–'85.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8975) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. LOGAN, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. GORMAN.

PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber culture, the laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BLAIR to add at the end of line 48 of section 3 of the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands the following words:

And upon proof of the expenditure of the full sum of $3 per acre as herein provided, and of the improvement required in this proviso, no further payment shall be required, and patent shall issue accordingly; but none of said lands shall ever be sold or held in larger bodies than 640 acres in a single ownership, which, as an express condition, shall be inserted in the original patent thereof; and breach of the condition shall render the lands liable to forfeiture to the United States.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to modify the amendment before the vote is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modified amendment has been read.

Mr. DOLPH. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment has since been considered by the committee and again modified by striking out the first clause down to the word "accordingly," in line 4, and the word "but," following it, and then inserting "Provided further;" so that it reads in this wise:

Provided further, That none of said lands shall ever be sold or held in larger bodies than 640 acres in a single ownership (unless title thereto be derived by inheritance), which, as an express condition, shall be inserted in the original patent thereof; and breach of the condition shall render the lands liable to forfeiture to the United States.

As thus modified the amendment is approved by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read, as now modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, at the end of line 48, it is proposed to add:

Provided further, That none of said lands shall ever be sold or held in larger bodies than 640 acres in a single ownership (unless title thereto be derived by inheritance), which, as an express condition, shall be inserted in the original patent thereof; and breach of the condition shall render the lands liable to forfeiture to the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. I should like simply to ask a question. I understand that under the present law regulating the sale of desert lands the amount that may be taken up by any one individual is 640 acres, one section. I understand also that until he has perfected his title by irrigating the land and bringing it into cultivation he can not transfer his inchoate right to any one else. In other words, the patent must issue in the name of the person who made the application for the entry. I would ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether I am right in thus understanding the law?

Mr. DOLPH. The original act is, which is not disturbed by the present bill:

Provided, That no person shall be permitted to enter more than one tract of land, not to exceed 640 acres, which shall be in compact form.

The question has been raised whether that was the original act by which a person declared his intention to take the claim or the final entry. The present bill with the amendment calls that the declaration. The final entry would be final proof so as to leave it standing that no person shall be permitted to enter more than one tract of 640 acres.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true; and yet I notice in section 5, and running through this and the following sections, that an assignment is allowed, which so far as I can understand the bill may take place immediately after the original declaration is made. The party having made his declaration of a purpose to take up a particular section of land under the desert-land law, immediately after that declaration may assign his right to another; and unless the amendment now proposed puts some limitation upon it, as the bill was reported, it seems to me that it opens the way for taking up in single ownership the valleys of all the streams in the desert region, because if any number of persons may be associated together under a preliminary agreement, if they choose to transfer their title or their declaration as soon as made to a corporation or to an individual this seems to open the door for such transfers. The effect of it would be in all those valleys where irrigation is difficult, where some expensive works would be necessary in order to bring water to them, that we should presently find these valleys in single ownership owned in enormous tracts.

Mr. DOLPH. I will state to the Senator that that is not the way the committee understand it, for this morning it was agreed to that those words allowing an assignment should be stricken out if any one objected to them. I think the only effect would be if a man had expended $2, to enable him to transfer his claim to the next man he would put on a dollar and he would have only one claim. It might be assigned during the progress of reclamation, but it was agreed in committee this morning that even those words might go out.

Mr. HARRISON. If that is done, it obviates the objection I am now making. It seems to me it would be a very short-sighted and even ruinous policy to leave this desert-land legislation in such shape that organizations for the purpose of constructing irrigating canals could be organized, and then under these assignments of declared claims a whole valley could be taken up and held in a single ownership.

It would be a great deal better that the restoration of these desert lands should be very slow rather than that the reclamation of them should be hastened by such processes as these. I think it clear that we should in this legislation stick close to the idea that these lands be taken up under the desert-land act where a larger area than agricultural lands is allowed, and something like the same restrictions as to transfer of ownership pending the acquisition of title from the Government should be legally maintained. It is not to the interest of the people or of the Government that these lands should be brought into cultivation at such an expense; that is, I mean at the cost of having them held in single ownership in vast bodies.

I shall therefore, when this amendment is disposed of, move to strike out the words allowing an assignment.

Mr. DOLPH. I am authorized to consent to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] to the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this amendment a question, so that we may thoroughly understand it. It provides that no larger ownership shall ever exist than 640 acres in one individual. Of course under the general construction of the law corporations are considered persons; but does the Senator understand that a corporation is considered an individual?

Mr. BLAIR. That would be the natural construction. This is an act to provide for the settlement and reclamation of these lands, and they are agricultural lands when reclaimed. The purpose of the amendment is just what it states, to prevent an accumulation of these lands and their aggregation in large masses in single holdings.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no exception made in reference to corporations.

Mr. LOGAN. What I want to get at is this: I know that all the courts construe a corporation to be a person in law, an artificial person; but whether there is a distinction made between a person and an individual in law is the question that I ask. The word "individual" is used here instead of the word "person," I believe.

Mr. DOLPH. Say "natural or artificial person," to make it sure.

Mr. LOGAN. Whether I agree to it or not makes no difference, but if your intention is to allow 640 acres of land to be held in the hands of one person you had better use the term "one person," and then it will apply to corporations as well as to individuals if that is the intention of the committee. If the intention of the committee is, however, to allow corporations to hold as much land as they want, and individuals not, that is another thing.

Mr. BLAIR. There was no such purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. I presume there was not. I only make the suggestion in order to have the language so that there will be no misconstruction about it.

Mr. BLAIR. After the word "individual" there the words "or corporate" might be added, so as to say "individual or corporate ownership."

Mr. LOGAN. I make the suggestion. If the Senator does not want to amend it, very well.

Mr. BLAIR. I say it may be amended to meet the suggestion of the Senator. Since the modification the Senator's objection does not arise. The language is in a "single ownership." The word "individual" is not used, nor is the word "person" or "corporation."

Mr. LOGAN. It was read in that way.

Mr. BLAIR. That was before the modification.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I desire to ask one further question. How will the Senator construe the language referring to individuals owning 640 acres of land in any portion of the country? Then, in a neighborhood, each head of a family may have 640 acres of land. Suppose any one of them should become dissatisfied and wish to move to some other part of the country, he would have to find a man who lived in some other part of the State to purchase his land, would he not? He can not sell under this bill to any of the other neighbors because each of them already owns 640 acres.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose it was to be sold on execution for debt?

Mr. LOGAN. As the Senator suggests, suppose an owner is in debt and a judgment is obtained against him and the land is sold on execution, who will buy the land? A man already owning 640 acres can not purchase the land. It can not be sold for taxes. I want to know what the meaning of this amendment is before I vote for it. I think it will be a pretty troublesome proposition in law when it comes to be analyzed.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment is designed to prevent the aggregation of ownership in a larger amount than 640 acres in any one single ownership, unless it may devolve by the ordinary rules of inheritance, which it is very difficult to interfere with. There would be undoubtedly some difficulties of the kind that Senators have suggested in the administration of this law; but it is not believed by those who advocate the amendment that those evils are at all commensurate with the other and greater evils which are likely to result from the aggregation of great bodies of land in single ownership, which is almost the inevitable result from the improvement of these lands and the almost necessary result of the ownership of the powers of irrigation and the works of irrigation by large companies or by wealthy individuals.

It can easily be seen that if expensive works of irrigation are erected, their owners will, unless there be some restrictive legislation, necessarily come to the control of the lands to which the water is necessary; and owning the land and the water in large tracts, the evils of landlordism, as it is called, will be the inevitable result. It is the purpose of this amendment to make such provision as will prevent these evils from coming to pass.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question bearing on this amendment. The amendment provides, "that none of said lands shall ever be sold or held in larger bodies than 640 acres in a single ownership," which condition shall be inserted in the original patent. Does the Senator think that we can control the disposition of these lands after the patent has issued? Has not all control of the Government then passed?

Mr. BLAIR. That is a condition to be inserted in the patent, and the ownership of the land will be accepted upon that condition. It will be a condition which will run with the land. It is designed so to be.

With reference to sales for taxes this would only prohibit the person who has already 640 acres of land becoming the purchaser at the tax sale; anybody else who is not in the possession of 640 acres will have an opportunity to purchase. It is the principal design of the amendment to distribute the ownership of this land in small holdings.

Mr. INGALLS. How about the county? It is a quasi-corporation, and it must purchase at the sale for taxes unless there are private purchasers.

Mr. BLAIR. I am not aware of any law or necessity that compels the county to purchase.

Mr. INGALLS. Under all laws that provide for the sale of property for taxes there is a provision, and there must be for the protection of communities, that whenever individual offerings are not made, the land is bid in by the county, so that the preferred lien of taxes may be thereby protected. Otherwise the law would be ineffectual. The county is a quasi-corporation. This language would equally apply there, so that you practically nullify all tax laws by the provision.

Mr. BLAIR. It is not quite to that extent. In the first place it would be a very slight inconvenience if the county were not able to purchase. The lands would remain, the lands would be improved, the lands would be sold if they were of any value. There would be likely to be a purchaser for the amount of the taxes at all events, and the county could of course purchase to the extent of a single tract. But the difficulties of this description, the difficulties of administration, which are more in fancy than in fact, would disappear, I think, in the practical operation of the law. But I am not able to see how, unless by some express provision of this kind, the other greater evils which have been alluded to and which civilized countries have so largely suffered can possibly be prevented.

This is not like the ordinary disposition of lands under the homestead law. It is not a case where there is no more than the ordinary danger of the accumulation of lands in large aggregations and single ownerships. From the very nature of the case, the irrigation will control the soil, unless there be some restrictive legislation of this sort.

Now, conceive of a large tract of 50, 60, 100, or 200 square miles of land where the irrigation for this large tract of land is in the hands of a syndicate of capitalists; they practically own the soil of this vast tract unless there is some restrictive legislation of this kind. They owning the water, the poor man who wishes to make a homestead is obliged to pay whatever rent they may ask, and if he is not able to pay that they very soon take his land, and in a short time by virtue of the control of the water they also control the soil itself, or if they reach it they take whatever they choose in the way of remedy.

Mr. LOGAN. This amendment does not intend where a man owns more than 640 acres of land to take it away from him, does it? Is that the object?

Mr. BLAIR. It intends that no man shall come to own of this land more than 640 acres.

Mr. LOGAN. But there may be those who have acquired it already. Suppose a man owns eight or ten thousand acres of land there, and has the patent for it.

Mr. BLAIR. This, of course, has no retroactive effect.

Mr. LOGAN. So I should understand it. Therefore those people who own large bodies of land there now are to be uninterrupted, but hereafter nobody else, poor or rich, shall compete with those men who own large bodies of land, because you hold them harmless in this amendment and prohibit everybody else from purchasing more than 640 acres. That seems to be the effect of the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. It may be that the evil already exists to a great extent. There are the Spanish grants, there are the instances which have been adduced in debate in the Senator's own State; and the object of this amendment is to prevent the extension of the difficulties. Of course vested rights can not be divested. We recognize that fact. It only has application to the future.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that I am against the amendment. I am only asking for information. This amendment, in other words, goes to this extent, that Congress proposes to determine that a man shall or shall not invest his money in a particular article that he desires, and that a man shall not sell to another unless Congress selects the person to whom he sells; that is, he can not sell to a man unless he is circumscribed by a certain limit of property. A person having beyond that can not be a purchaser. Hence, a poor man who desires to sell his land shall only sell it to an individual who does not own land, for if he owns any land he can not buy 640 acres, for if he did it would be in excess of the amount named in the amendment.

Thus a man is restricted in his sales. He is not to find his purchaser at all unless that purchaser comes within a certain description. If that man has no land he can purchase 640 acres, but if he has 5 acres he can not. Hence you prescribe by law the character of the purchaser that shall be found in that Territory so far as owning real estate is concerned. Congress takes it upon itself to say that a man shall purchase if he belongs to a certain class and holds within a certain limit of property, and if he holds beyond that he shall not become a purchaser. In other words, he shall not select his own investment; Congress shall dictate to him where his investment shall be placed.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. If he owns 40 acres of desert land he can buy 600 more, and if he owns 320 he can buy 320 more.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; but if he owns 1 acre he can not buy 640 acres.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. He can buy 639.

Mr. LOGAN. But he can not select the quantity he desires; that is what I mean. He is restricted in his purchase, and the man who sells is restricted in his sale. I do not pretend to say whether this principle is right or wrong, I merely want to know what it is.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. One other word right there: How are the people generally to have notice of the fact of just how much land the purchaser owns? If a purchaser should happen to have more than he is entitled to hold by virtue of this provision, how is John Doe, the seller, to know the fact? This condition of my friend from New Hampshire, according to his theory, follows and renders the purchase void.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator think that, with notice of this condition in the patent itself, the person who proposes to purchase will be so ignorant of his own affairs that he will buy additional land to be forfeited, and pay for it? The person who sells gets his money. The purchaser is the man who has knowledge of the amount of the land he already possesses. He knows whether he has 640 acres of this land. If now he chooses to buy some more to increase his holding beyond that amount and to pay for it, the seller, the person of whom he purchases, suffers no injury. He buys in violation of law and in violation of an express condition that runs with the land; and if he has notice in a matter with regard to which he will have full information, he acts knowingly.

Mr. HARRISON. I think what the Senator from Oregon is getting at is this: Suppose a man having one of these sections of desert land offers it to me for sale; I have none of it; I am competent to buy; there is no disqualification on my part. But it may be that the seller has acquired this 640 acres of land, having at the time he acquired it 640 acres besides somewhere else in New Mexico or California or some other State or Territory. Would not the amendment as proposed avoid the title in my hands, and could I buy safely without searching the records of every county that had desert land in it?

Mr. BLAIR. That might possibly be so; but there is an old adage, "beware the purchaser;" and undoubtedly there would be regulations made that would protect the title. Difficulties of this description can be suggested ad infinitum, but they would all be likely to disappear in the practical working of the law; and we have to elect at all events between the allowance of the continuance of evils which have already commenced and other and very serious aggravations in this country. Unless we can affix some such condition as this which shall apply to the original transfer of title from the Government and which shall run with the land, I see no way; and if Senators do I would be very glad if they would suggest it—I see no way to guard against the ultimate aggregation of the ownership of these desert lands in a very few individuals.

Other countries limit the holding of their lands; have done so in past times and do it in the present time, and I do not believe that we shall find any serious difficulty in carrying out a law of this description. Something certainly ought to be done, and if Senators who see these objections and anticipate these difficulties can suggest a different remedy, I, for one, shall be very glad to acquiesce in it.

Mr. HARRISON. I am in sympathy with any amendment that tends to limit the ownership of this land to small holdings. I think it is the true policy of the Government in disposing of these lands that it should dispose of them in small sections, and that so far as possible it should impress this condition upon them after they have passed from the Government. But it seems to me that there is as to this amendment the objection which has been suggested by the Senator from Oregon. Perhaps it may be that as the right to enforce the forfeiture is left with the Government, it may be taken for granted that the forfeiture would not be enforced as against an innocent person who had bought under such circumstances. That is the only suggestion that occurs to me.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will observe that the amendment makes the title forfeitable; it is not forfeited per se; and of course the equity of the case, as was suggested the other day, would always be the rule of the administration of the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB. This amendment was authorized to be offered by the Committee on Public Lands. It is applicable to only a comparatively small area of the public domain; that is to say, an area which is small in comparison with that which has heretofore been disposed of, and will be rendered smaller no doubt by the fact that not a large proportion of what is now desert land can ever be reclaimed for lack of water; at all events much of it can not be reclaimed by any water now existing in the surface flowing in that channel.

It simply perpetuates the rule of ownership which the law requires in the exception; that is to say the law permits only the acquisition of 640 acres now. My judgment is that what is enough in the beginning is enough always. If there is any propriety in limiting the acquisition of the desert lands to the extent of saying that not more than 640 acres shall be acquired by any person, there is just as much reason, and I think more, for saying that that limitation shall always remain and that no more than 640 acres of this land shall ever be aggregated in the hands of any one holder.

It may not be a very big step toward what is called land reform, but at any rate it is a step in the right direction, and whatever reasons may exist now for it they will undoubtedly increase with years.

There is force in the suggestion of my colleague that at some time these lands may be sold for taxes; and yet that policy which has become necessary in all the Western States at least, of permitting the local authorities to purchase, and in fact requiring them to purchase, in order that the lands may not remain unsold might require larger bodies in that way to become the property of the different counties or perhaps the cities or the States in which these lands are located. But that provision of law could very well be modified. That rule existing which is necessary to a certain extent may not continue necessary; and if it does, or if something like it should seem necessary, undoubtedly the Territories can by appropriate legislation adopt some provision which will obviate the necessity of such wholesale purchases by the counties or by the other municipalities.

I think myself that it is well to begin at this point to put some limitation upon the acquisition of large bodies of land. With the disappearance of the public domain, the lands in the hands of private owners will enormously enhance in value. This is foreseen by persons who have idle money and to whom real estate is attractive, and they are now purchasing bodies of land as they have never done before. While I do not think as a rule such purchases have heretofore proven very profitable, they are more likely from now on to become so, by reason of the fact, as I said, that the Government will cease to sell land to private persons.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas a question if he will permit.

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. If the reasoning of the Senator is good in reference to the limitation of the acquisition of land under this bill, why not apply it to homesteads?

Mr. PLUMB. It might well be applied to homesteads, although the reason in my judgment is not so strong. In the first place, an association of persons is necessary in order to put water upon this land. Inevitably the water and the land go together, and necessarily of course the ownership would have a tendency that way which does not exist where homesteads are taken by small proprietors.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. In answer to that, it seems to me that the argument is stronger in favor of limiting the acquisition of land where there is the strongest inducement for the aggregation of capital to acquire the land. I wish to prevent that, and for that very reason I am in favor of the opposite conclusion.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think it is so, but still I hope the Senator will not object to this proposition because he can not reach something else. The person who buys the desert land must necessarily have water along with it, while in the case of a homstead the tract of land will be watered by nature and it will only be necessary to purchase the land. In the former case more capital will be required, and it of course will absorb a larger quantity than the single tracts permitted to be acquired by one person.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Is it not necessary to make the grant conditional? After Congress has provided a way by which the title shall be made to a certain portion of the public domain, and that way has been followed and a certificate has been issued, is not the constitutional power then forever gone to make any provision whatever in reference to that matter, as to how it shall be owned, how transferred, as to who shall own it, or anything about it? Is there not an insuperable barrier unless you make the grant conditional and the condition runs all the way through?

Mr. PLUMB. That is exactly what I propose to do. We propose to attach a condition to the purchase that the land shall be available in certain quantities. I do not think there is any doubt of the power of Congress to do that, because possibly the possession may not be ample enough; and I as one of the committee would be very much obliged to the Senator from Oregon if he would apply his legal acumen to this amendment and make it more certain to accomplish the object.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I am opposed to any such provision as will make the grant of pre-emption or homestead or desert land conditional. I think it will lead to inextricable confusion, and for that reason I am opposed to any such provision. I think if you are to provide that certain parties can take up a certain quantity of land for homestead, or a certain quantity of land as a pre-emption claim, or a certain quantity of land as a desert-land or as timber-culture or timber-entry, you should fix the amount he shall take, and then make a stringent provision that he shall comply with all the terms in order to get that land, and after he has got it that he shall have the title absolute, and that no condition shall attach, but it shall run on forever. That is my idea.

Mr. PLUMB. There may be some inconveniences asserted about almost any proposed legislation, and that of course would be inconvenient. The Senator from Illinois suggested the inconvenience it would make to a man who had 1 acre and wanted to buy a tract of 640 acres. That is, upon the theory that these rectangular pieces of land as surveyed by the Government and as held by the Government will continue for all time to come; but that is merely a matter of minor consequence. The great overshadowing thing is speculation in the soil; and that, I think, ought to be prevented as far as possible.

The world is wide enough. There are inventions enough of different kinds, there are enterprises enough of all sorts into which the genius of the skillful and determined people of the United States and of the world can get without being permitted to speculate in the lands in order to bring them wealth and competence. I think it is wise to begin a limitation upon the holding of lands. It does not attach to that which has already been done.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I was quite well satisfied with the bill as reported by the committee. I have voted, and will vote again, that in giving out these lands originally by the Government, they may be given in small holdings, especially the arable lands, those that have the average fertility and productiveness of farming lands. But if I am correctly informed, from what I have heard and from what I have seen of sage-brush land, the portion I have been across in going to California, 640 acres would not feed a goat. I do not know who would ever want to take that land in small quantities.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator mean after it has been subjected to irrigation?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not wholly desert land if it is where it can be well watered.

Mr. HARRISON. Men can not take it except by irrigation; they can not get a title to it at all without irrigating it.

Mr. HAWLEY. There comes another question. Who will undertake this expensive scheme of irrigation if he can hold only 640 acres? You may have to combine the requisite number of men who may have 50,000, 100,000 or 200,000 acres to make the necessary irrigation.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that the obvious way in a majority of cases is that they organize and build the canals and let out the water to farmers precisely as water companies in cities do to private consumers.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is possible it may work in that way, but I do not like to assume to attach conditions to the soil which shall remain with it after it passes out of the control of the National Government; and whenever this territory shall become the territory of a State, I believe in leaving to the State the absolute control of title in all respects.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words, in lines 4 and 5, "said lands shall ever," and inserting the words "the public lands of the United States shall hereafter;" so that instead of reading as now:

That none of said lands shall ever be sold or held in larger bodies than 640 acres in a single ownership—

It will read:

That none of the public lands of the United States shall hereafter be sold or held in larger bodies than 640 acres in a single ownership.

The suggestion of the Senator from Nevada was very pertinent and just. The considerations which moved him had already presented themselves to my mind. I am clear in my opinion that if there should be a limitation in the ownership of lands it should apply to the land that is valuable, and valuable for a single owner in small quantities, rather than to land that is valueless unless it is held in large quantities. Logically there is no reason why, if this principle is to apply to all, it should not apply to the provisions of the homestead and pre-emption and timber-culture acts, if the two latter are to be retained.

I understand that this is a movement in the direction of the distribution of property in this country per capita. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] suggests "communism." I do not echo his opinion; but the same argument which will apply to the inhibition of the ownership of lands in large quantities will apply to a restriction upon the ownership of cattle in large quantities or money in sums that are beyond the personal use of him who enjoys it.

Without any reference whatever to communism, or to anarchy, or to socialism, or to nihilism, I say that this amendment is in the direction of the equal distribution of property, real, personal, and mixed, per capita among all the inhabitants of this country. That is exactly what it means. There is a declaration that the ownership of lands shall be limited so far as the title which the United States Government can convey is concerned. Very well; I do not say that I am opposed to that. I do not know what right any one man has to the possession of $100,000,000 while hundreds of thousands of his fellow-beings within, it may be, the reach of the sound of his voice are suffering for the necessaries of life. I do not understand upon what system of justice, either natural, legal, or social, such a distribution of property can be justified.

Every living being under the protection of the law has a right to a livelihood and to the means of support. One of the crying evils of this epoch is the gigantic, indefensible, inexplicable accumulation of property, far beyond the need or the requirements of a possible use of the individual who has acquired it; while, at the same time, thousands and millions of others equally well qualified, morally, physically, and mentally, starve for the necessaries of life.

If this is a matter in which Government can properly interfere, how can we better begin than by declaring that so far as we are concerned there shall be a uniform distribution among all the people of this country of the public lands of the United States, that there shall be no accumulation in private hands or in corporate hands, no matter what may be the faculties or the powers of men, no matter what may be their habits of industry or indolence, of sagacity or improvidence, no matter what may be the natural differences in man, ordained by God and beyond the power of legislation—that so far as we are concerned every man, black and white, provident and improvident, old and young, shall have his equal and proportionate share of the public domain?

As I said, that is exactly what this amendment means. In so far as we can put it in language, in so far as we can deal with the subject by statute, this is the enactment of the equal distribution of property. It is declaring that legislation shall take the place of energy, sagacity, intelligence, good morals, industry, whatever makes men strong and communites powerful and great; that hereafter so far as we are concerned we shall dispense with the results of ignorance and vice and improvidence, and that in everything which affects the public property of the United States every man by virtue of the fact that he is a man and a citizen shall have his equal proportionate share.

If this is to apply to sage-brush land, if it is to apply to the region of greasewood and of jack-rabbits and gray sand, that can only be made arable when the tribute of the streams is poured over it by the hand of man, why should it not apply to the fat and fertile prairies of the West? Why should it not apply to the rich alluvial bottoms of the streams that empty into the Missouri and the Mississippi? What is the reason why this beneficence of legislation should be applied to that region where alone it is ineffectual and indifferent? So far as these lands are concerned, lying in the basins of the mountains at great elevations, where the beneficent showers are shut off by intervening mountain ranges, all that land is valueless unless the streams can be diverted from their natural channels and pour in their fertile waters upon those arid sands. It is admitted that it will require capital, aggregated, corporate, in order to construct the miles of ditch and canal necessary for this purpose.

The poor man has no use for the land which is to be reclaimed under the desert-land act. No homestead settler, no pre-emptor, no timber-culture claimant ever seeks his little area in that region. That is left for men of capital; that is left for corporations that can command vast means to construct these great avenues for the water. If we are legislating for the great number of small holders, if we intend to enforce the idea that it is only through the great multitude of small freeholders of land that the institutions of this country are to be preserved, then this principle must be applied to that region where the small freeholders go.

Therefore it is that I propose to amend the amendment. I propose to make this beneficent principle apply not alone to the region that is described by the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, but to make it apply to all the public domains of the United States, so that hereafter by no means whatever of device or contrivance or perjury or purchase shall there be any holding in the hands of a single individual of more than 640 acres so long as there is another individual within the limits of the United States and claiming citizenship who desires to become a pre-emptor, a homesteader, or a timber-act claimant upon the public domain.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the public mind has been directed recently (and when I say recently I mean within the last five or six years) to the question of saving the public land for settlers. There has been a very general opinion among the people, and not without some cause, that there was a large amount of public land being appropriated not by persons who desired to make homes on it, but by those who desired to hold the land for speculative purposes.

That has been true to a considerable extent. It has always been true. It was as true forty years ago as it is to-day, to the degree in which entries were then made. They were not made as numerous as to-day, yet the proportionate number of entries for speculative purposes made in 1850 I have no doubt was equal to the number made in 1880 and subsequent years.

I have spent a quarter of a century upon the frontier; I have lived in a public-land State, and I claim to have some knowledge of the condition of that country and other sections of the United States where the public-land laws have been in force for the last twenty-five years. I may say that I know something from actual observation and experience of the condition of the land from a little west of Chicago to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, a distance of more than a thousand miles; and I repeat that the frauds now complained of are no greater in proportion, in my judgment, than heretofore. But we have now reached a condition of affairs, with reference to the public land, where the small area that is still left, as compared with the great area that we had forty years ago, has attracted the public attention, and we have therefore pretty generally all over the United States concluded that the land hereafter should be reserved for the actual settler.

More than eight years ago in this body I introduced a bill for the repeal of the pre-emption law. I think it would have been wise to have repealed it then, because the people who really desire to make homes upon the arable portions of the public domain can make them under the homestead as properly as under the pre-emption law. It would have been wisdom on the part of the framers of the homestead law if when they passed that law in 1862 they had at the same time repealed the pre-emption law.

I am as desirous of maintaining the public land for the settler as anybody in this country. I join with every one who regrets that any portion of the public land, or any considerable portion of it at least, is in the hands of corporations or bodies or individuals even who do not make actual and immediate use thereof. Yet I want to say that the cry so frequently made that the land is being aggregated in the hands of a few in the United States is not sustained by the facts. I heard the other day upon the floor of the Senate statements which have gone out to the laboring people of this country, in substance notifying them that it was no longer possible for them to make homes on the public land; that the public land had been absorbed by the capitalists of the country; that it had been absorbed by the railroad companies of the country, and by people who have been more fortunate in getting on the frontier early, and who had capital with which to aggregate vast quantities of land. I recollect that I have heard within the last ten days on the floor of the Senate the statement made that the tenant system in this country was worse than it was in Ireland.

I wish to enter my protest against all such statements for two reasons: First, they are to the men who ought to be going west and seeking homes upon the public lands an official utterance from the Senate of the United States that there is no opportunity for them thus to make homes. Next, these statements are a declaration which is eagerly seized upon by those who are complaining of their lot, who are dissatisfied with the conditions of society, who are ready to break out into revolution and disturbing the organized conditions of society upon the theory that they have a grievance against the Government of the United States.

The record has been made by the Government of the United States and put within the reach of all who speak and write upon this subject. We have within the reach of everybody in this country the Census Reports of 1870 and 1880. There have recently appeared in the publications of the day articles written by men who prophesy a condition of affairs in this country with reference to land equally as bad as that of Ireland, England, and Scotland; and newspaper and magazine articles have been quoted that have been published in this country stating allegations of the character I mention as facts.

I have taken a little pains to go over the records of the Government upon this question, and I shall very briefly refer to them in order to show that there is no such considerable aggregation of the public land, or the land that has not been public for many years, in the hands of a few to the exclusion of the many; that in twenty years we have more than doubled the number of farms without very largely increasing the area of those farms; that while during the ten years from 1870 to 1880 the increase in farms was 51 per cent., the increase in the area was about 31 per cent.; that while the small farms under 3 acres, between 3 acres and 10 acres, and between 10 acres and 20 acres, have been very rapidly decreasing, the large farms have not increased in proportionate numbers to the decrease of the small farms, and that the great increase of farms in this country has been of that class of farms which indicates to any man who is familiar with the rural districts of the United States a condition, not of destitution, not of want, but of prosperity. They are neither very large farms nor very small ones, indicating as I say that the owners of land who are neither poor nor rich have got control very largely of the land in this country—the class of men who send their sons to colleges, who educate them to the duties of life; the class of men who dominate and control every portion of this country to-day, either themselves or their sons; the class of men from whom spring the best people in the United States; and when I say that it is equivalent to saying the best people in the world, the boys who are brought up on a farm not so small that there is poverty, distress, want, and destitution, but where there is comfort, intelligence, virtue, education. They are the class of men who have doubled and trebled their farms in the United States in the last decade as shown by the census.

In 1870 the number of farms in the United States was 2,659,985. In 1880 the number was 4,008,907, or an increase of 1,348,022. In 1870 the number of farms under 20 acres was 473,503. I will stop here to speak of a farm of 20 acres. Everybody understands that a farm of 20 acres, unless it is a garden farm in the vicinity of a city, is not sufficient to support a family in the independence in which American families are usually supported and in which they ought to be supported. Therefore it is not a matter of regret that the small farms should disappear and that the moderate-sized farms of which I have spoken should take their place. In 1880 the number under 20 acres was 393,990, or a decrease of 79,513 farms of an area less than 20 acres. In 1870 the number of farms containing 20 acres and over in the United States was 2,186,419. In 1880 that class of farms had increased to 3,614,917, or an increase of farms above 20 acres of 1,428,498. In 1870 the number of farms of 50 acres and less than 100 acres was 754,221. In 1880 the number was 1,032,810, an increase of 278,589, or 37 per cent.

In 1870 the number of farms of 100 acres and less than 500 acres was 565,054. This is the class of farms of which I have spoken. This is the class of farms upon which I say live the intelligent American farmers. This is the class of farms from which the boys go out to fill all the American colleges, to fill nearly all the learned professions in this country, and to control and dominate commerce, politics, and religion. They go out from these American homes of from 100 acres up to 500 acres, not including, you will see, the 500-acre farms but the 160-acre farms and the 320-acre farms which are somewhat common in the West and in the South.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator repeat the number of that class of farms?

Mr. TELLER. I will; and I desire to attract to that class of farms the attention not simply of the Senate but of the country, because I hold that it is not desirable that the American farmer should be confined to a small farm of 50 acres. I do not believe in these days of improved machinery and increased demands of the farmer for that which his father perhaps felt he could do without, that a farm of much less than this acreage can support in comfort, in prosperity, and in happiness an American farmer. In 1870 the number was 565,054. In 1880 it was 1,695,983, or more than three times what it was in 1870, an increase of 1,130,929 in ten years. Does anybody see danger to this country from an American citizen owning less than 500 acres? These farms are every one of them under 500 acres.

Mr. GEORGE. And over 100 acres?

Mr. TELLER. Over 100 acres, the farms between that, including 100 acres, and less than 500 acres. I wish to ask again, does anybody anticipate that there is danger to this country by the aggregation of less than 500 acres of land in the hands of any intelligent American citizen?

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him another question right there? Do those numbers represent the total area of the farms or only the cultivated portion?

Mr. TELLER. These figures represent the men who own and cultivate some portion of the land.

Mr. GEORGE. A part of it being in wood?

Mr. TELLER. A part of it being in wood. The census report shows what proportion to the whole is in wood, in pasture, in meadow, and what portion is cultivated. This, of course, in this class of farms argues and testifies to the prosperity of the American citizen, and I look at it and read it with pleasure. It indicates to me that the men on whom we rely for the safety and perpetuity of the Government, for its proper administration, and for its prosperity, are prosperous themselves. You may accumulate millions in Wall street, you may accumulate great fortunes in banks and in moneyed centers. but this means prosperity to between seven million and nine million men who secure their living upon farms in this country.

In 1870 the number of farms containing 500 acres and less than 1,000 acres was 15,873; in 1880 the number of this class was 75,972, or an increase of 60,199. It will be observed that there has been a very large percentage of increase in that kind of farms. That fact has been seized and paraded through the country to show that there was an aggregation of all the lands in the hands of a few; and yet if you will take the census reports and take the States in which these big farms exist, of which I shall speak hereafter, you will find that they are in the very States where there is apparently to-day the least danger from the aggregation of property of that kind in the hands of a few. They are largely in the South. They are largely in Mississippi, in Georgia, in Alabama, in Arkansas, and States of that character. I submit that the fact must be patent to every man who studies the question that there is not in that section of the country any immediate prospect of the aggregation of these farms in the hands of the few to the destruction of the many.

In 1870 the total area in farms in the United States was 407,735,041 acres. In 1880 the total area in farms was 536,081,835 acres, or an increase of 128,346,794 acres in ten years. It will be seen that while the number of farms increased 50 per cent. the area increased only about 31 per cent. The total increase in farms, as I have before stated, was 1,348,922, and the acreage 128,346,794, or an average of a little less than 90 acres for each new farm.

It will also be observed that there was a decrease from 1870 to 1880 in the small farms of 79,000—that is, in the farms containing less than 20 acres; and in the farms containing 20 acres and less than 50 acres the decrease was 66,140, or a total decrease in the farms under 50 acres of 135,140. The decrease in the small farms and the average increase in the new farms indicate that there has been during that decade at least no considerable aggregation of the land in the hands of the few.

I have prepared a table for my own convenience showing the number of farms in the several States in 1870 and in 1880, the increase between 1870 and 1880, the average size of all the farms in each State in 1870 and the average in 1880. I shall not read the table but I submit it to go in the RECORD. It is as follows:

I have prepared another table which I shall put in the RECORD, showing the increase of farms of 50 acres and less than 100 acres, and the increase of farms of 100 acres and less than 500 acres, between 1870 and 1880:

Increase of farms of 50 acres and less than 100 acres, and 100 acres and less than 500 acres, from 1870 to 1880.

I find, for instance, that in the State of Alabama, which had 12,444 farms of 50 acres and less than 100 acres more than in 1870, they had of farms of 100 acres and less than 500 acres 33,535. So you may go through the different States and you will see that the increase of these farms has indicated not the aggregation of vast bodies of land in the hands of a few, but a general distribution among the very people who ought to control, and who do control, the land in this country.

So that Senators may understand the tables, I will state that the aggregate of the two columns will sometimes be greater than the whole number of increase shown in the other table, but that arose from the fact that in the same State the small holdings very largely decreased.

Mr. GEORGE. Were the tables made from the census report?

Mr. TELLER. These tables are made from the census reports, and have been verified and corrected. I believe them to be absolutely correct, unless the accountant may occasionally have made an error in casting up; nothing more than that.

It will be seen by these tables, as can be seen by anybody who chooses to go to the reports, that while all classes of farms above the 50-acre limit have increased, yet the average size of the farms in 1880 is less than it was in 1870 and less than in 1860 and in 1850. The average size of farms in the United States in 1870 was 153 acres, and in 1880 it was 134 acres.

Mr. GEORGE. Have you the average size of the farms in 1850 and 1860?

Mr. TELLER. I can not give it from this volume. I will simply say that there has been a decrease in the size of farms from 1850 to the present time, and perhaps before I get through I shall turn to some notes and be able to give the exact figures.

There are in the United States, as shown by the census of 1880, 28,578 farms above 1,000 acres, and that has been made the text of magazine and newspaper articles and of rostrum speeches ad nauseam. We have been pointed to the fact that there were 28,000 farms in the United States of more than 1,000 acres each. When you take into consideration the vast area of this country, when you take into consideration the fact that those 28,000 farms are among a people of sixty million, it is not at all startling, and it does not make any comparison with Ireland, England, Scotland, or Wales, as some declaimers have declared.

I have prepared a table showing where these farms are, which I will submit. The following States each have more than one hundred such farms:

Alabama	1,868	Kansas	235
Arkansas	648	Minnesota	145
Florida	377	Missouri	685
Georgia	3,491	Colorado	114
Kentucky	1,112	California	2,531
Louisiana	1,319	Wisconsin	109
Mississippi	1,833	Oregon	352
North Carolina	1,721	Nevada	118
South Carolina	1,635
Texas	3,793	Total Western and Pacific States	5,577
Virginia	1,563
West Virginia	845
Tennessee	1,086	New York	281
		Pennsylvania	244
Total Southern States	21,291	New Hampshire	104
		Ohio	252
Illinois	649	Maine	116
Indiana	275
Iowa	364	Total	997

Thus it will be seen that in the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, and Tennessee, out of the 28,000 there are 21,291.

Mr. GEORGE. What sort of farms?

Mr. TELLER. Farms of over 1,000 acres. I repeat what I said before that I do not believe any intelligent man in this country who has kept himself posted on the condition of those States is complaining of land aristocracy there to-day. Whatever may have been the case in the past, no such complaint can be properly lodged to-day, and the holders of the lands are prepared, I think, as a general rule, to part with them at reasonable prices and on proper terms.

Mr. GEORGE. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. TELLER. I cite this to show that in the regions of country where capital is the most aggressive, and where the people have had the most of it, they are not aggregating the public land; that capital has not taken that direction to any considerable extent. Take the State of Illinois. It has only 649 farms above 1,000 acres; and Indiana has only 275 such farms; Iowa, 364, and Kansas, 235. With free land and cheap land in Kansas to be had of railroad companies, and of settlers who became discouraged and were ready to sell, there were only 235 farms in Kansas in 1880 of 1,000 acres and above. California has 2,531; Colorado, 114; Nevada, 118, and Oregon, 352. It will also be seen from the table I have submitted that the great State of New York, with its millions of unused capital in its cities and with its milionaires by the hundred, has only 281 farms containing more than 1,000 acres; Pennsylvania has 244 and Ohio 252.

I assert that an examination of the census reports and of these tables ought to put a stop to the repeated assertion that the capitalists of the United States have laid their hands upon the land to the exclusion of the men who desire to till the soil for a living. It is not true in the West, in the South, in the East, or in the Middle States.

I wish to show that the decrease of farms from 20 acres to under 50 acres in the United States is not the result of the poverty of the people. It is not because the people are compelled to part with their holdings because some capitalist envies them their possession and has paid a price that compels them to part with their property. The States which have decreased their holdings of that kind are Arkansas, Colorado, Connecticut, Dakota, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, West Virginia, and Wisconsin—East and West alike. It simply argues prosperity on the part of the American agriculturist, and because of his prosperity he has increased his boundaries and extended his borders.

I have submitted a table showing the increased number of farms in the several States during the ten years from 1870 to 1880. I wish now to call attention to the vast number of farms. Let me take by way of illustration the State of Alabama. The State of Alabama between 1870 and 1880 increased its number of farms 58,582. The average increase, taking the increased number of acres to enter into the farming land of Alabama, shows that the average of the farms thus increased was 63½ acres only. Arkansas increased her holdings 45,011, or very nearly double her holdings, and yet Arkansas had only an average of 138 acres in this increased number of farms. Illinois increased her number of farms 52,938, and the average size of her farms to-day is 124 acres. The average added to her farms during the years from 1870 to 1880 was only 109 acres, showing that with the increased number of farms came smaller farms and not larger.

Oregon, a State where land is to be had cheap, where donation lands are obtained in larger areas than under the ordinary settlement law, has an average of only 210 acres in her new farms. California increased her number of farms during the decade of which I am speaking 12,210. Her average number of acres in farms now is 462 acres, and the average size of the farms that she thus increased is only 423 acres. New York increased her number of farms considerably, and the average size of the farms thus increased was only 64 acres. Nebraska made a very great increase, from about 12,000 farms in 1870 to above 63,000 in 1880, and her increase, on an average, was only 154 acres, showing that very largely this system of increase in the new land States—and I can say the same of Kansas—arises from the fact that a settler may take 160 acres of land, and occasionally a settler could not get 160 acres, and thus the average falls a little below the Government subdivision of a quarter-section. In Kansas the average of her new farms was 157 acres. Missouri added a very large number of farms during the decade of which I am speaking. Missouri added 67,247 farms. Her average of farms now is 129 acres. The average of the farms that she added during the decade was only 91 acres. An examination of the census reports will show that 55 per cent. of the farms of the United States are less than 100 acres.

States having farms of 500 acres and less than 1,000, and the number.

I wish to say a word in reply to what was said the other day about the timber-culture law and the desert-land act. I have been furnished by the officials of the Land Department since that speech was made with a statement, bearing date June 17, 1886, of the original homesteads, final homesteads, number of entries, &c., as well as the timber-culture and desert-land entries. It was asserted here that the greatest frauds had been perpetrated under the desert-land act; that the timber-culture act was an innocuous sort of act, but that the desert-land act was extremely violent. There have been under the desert-land act 3,381,178.56 acres filed upon, or applied for, or declared for—the various forms of expression used in this bill. Four hundred and eighty-five thousand two hundred and forty-eight and forty-five one-hundredths acres in all have been certified by final certificate, less than half a million acres since 1878, when the act was passed.

There can not have been any very great and extended fraud under that act in the way at least of appropriating public land. The complaint which is rightfully made of the act by the Department, and has been for years, is not that men succeeded in acquiring from the United States land not properly belonging to the applicants, but that by their filing they held from the settler the land upon which they put their filings, and they hold it out so that it ceases to be public land for all practical use for a period of years, and then abandon it.

It is not in my judgment so much the fault of the law after all as it is the fault of the country. The people have applied for this land hoping and expecting that they would be able to make title to it by putting the water upon it, and they have found out in very many cases that it can not be done. There appeared this morning in the Committee on Public Lands incidentally and accidentally a young man from the State of Illinois who had gone down to Arizona. He told me that he and his friend had put in between four and five hundred thousands dollars in a ditch which had been by storms very badly damaged, so that they had been utterly unable to furnish the applicants with water with which they expected to redeem the land and make their title. I have within my own knowledge one other ditch company in the same region that suffered in the same way. They were neither dishonest nor unfair; they hoped and expected when they filed upon this section of land that by the time they were compelled to prove up there would be an opportunity to purchase water of the ditch company. The ditch company failed and the land remains unoccupied, but the title is in the Government of the United States. This amendment prevents them, not from filing, but provides that when they file they must show that they have some means of acquiring the water, and that every year they must make to the Department a proper report with maps showing that they are making progress towards the ultimate reclamation of the land. When that safeguard is thrown around the appropriation of land under the act, with the other safeguards put around it in the bill, I do not believe there will be any considerable complaint.

The timber-culture act is a law that was intended to be beneficent, and is to some extent. It is to the extent at least that it clothes any 10 acres with timber in the timberless regions, but it was intended to make the country more habitable. It was believed that if every short distance a 10-acre grove could be raised, it would have a beneficial effect upon the climate, and it was supposed the Government could under such terms readily part with its title. The settler must go upon the land, not to live upon it, but he must cultivate 10 acres of land and put it in trees and must continue their growth at least eight years before he can obtain title. In the great majority of cases the settler has found it utterly impossible so to do, or he has found that the cost of so doing was so extravagant compared with the value of the land that he has abandoned it. The complaint made by the Department, and justly made, was not that they were appropriating the land and getting the title without putting on the trees, but that an interested party going out and following up the surveyor would file his timber-culture claim and hold the land from settlement for a year, and then say to the settler who came along, "give me $50," or $100, or whatever it might be, "and I will relinquish my timber-culture claim and you may file on it for a homestead. That is where the trouble has been, and that is where the fraud has been. But little of this land has passed into private ownership, as I shall show by the statement I have from the Department.

Under the timber-culture act the number and area of entries made to June 30, 1885, was as follows:

Original entries 159,244 in number, or 25,607,546.14 acres. Final entries 1,967 in number, or 249,489.78 acres. There have been only 1,967 pieces of land certified to the owners under the timber-culture act, and under the desert-land act 1,451 or 485,248.45 acres, or on an average of 330 acres each. That is the average size of a desert-land act claim. It can not be more than 640 acres, but it must have been very much less in a great many cases, because the average of the whole is only 330 acres.

The other day a Senator spoke of the tenant system in this country as equal to that of Ireland. There are in the United States, as shown by the census reports, 1,024,801 tenant farmers. Of this number 322,557 are cash tenants, largely of the class who hire a little piece of land in the neighborhood of a town upon which to make their gardens. Seven hundred and two thousand two hundred and forty-four of them till the land for a share of the crop. I wish to submit to the Senate and to the country that the men who till land upon shares will never degenerate into the condition of the Irish or the English tenantry. It is the cash tenants who are ground down by the landlord. There are thousands and tens of thousands of young men in the States, and even some of them in the newer States, who go upon land and work it for a few years with the expectation and with the ultimate object of becoming its owners, and their expectations are largely realized.

It was said here the other day that the system of tenantry was as bad in the United States as in Ireland; and that statement I have seen repeated in the public press, and I have seen it in magazine articles. We ought to take into consideration the fact that Ireland is somewhat less in area than the State of Indiana and with very much less arable land; that it has in all only about 20,000,000 acres of land. Ireland has something over five hundred thousand tenants, half as many as in all the United States, half as many as can be found among a people of sixty millions.

Mr. GEORGE. Out of a population of how many?

Mr. TELLER. Out of a population of about 5,000,000. For the purpose of showing the difference between our condition and that of Ireland and England, I wish to read from the Financial Reform Almanac for 1886, which I have taken the pains to verify by the English publications, and I read from it because it is more convenient to read from than the books in the Library. It says:

From the Domesday returns of 1874—

Which are returns made to the British Government officially—

From the Domesday returns of 1874 (which, as we have pointed out, very greatly understated the facts as to the size of the large landed estates, having altogether omitted London, and uninclosed woods, &c., and leases reputed to be for ninety-nine or more years), the main facts appeared to be that in England and Wales—

Twelve persons own 1,038,883 acres.

Sixty-six persons own 1,917,076 acres.

Mr. DAWES. Does the last number, sixty-six, include the first twelve?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. DAWES. Sixty-six other persons.

Mr. TELLER. Sixty-six other persons.

One hundred persons own 3,917,641 acres.

Two hundred and eighty persons own 5,425,764 acres, or about one-sixth of the inclosed lands.

Five hundred and twenty-three persons own one-fifth of all England and Wales.

Seven hundred and ten persons own one-fourth of all England and Wales.

Eight hundred and seventy-four persons own 9,267,031 acres.

Ten thousand two hundred and seven persons own two-thirds of the whole of England and Wales.

In Northumberland County, which contains 1,220,000 acres, some twenty-six persons own half the county.

One man owns over 186,397 acres in England.

Another owns over 102,785 acres in England.

A body of 4,500 men own 17,498,200 acres, or more than half England and Wales.
In Scotland, where the total area is 18,946,694 acres, one man owns 1,326,000 acres, and has besides 32,095 acres in England; total, 1,358,095 acres.
Another has 431,000 acres.
Another has 424,000 acres.
Another has 306,000 acres.
Twelve owners have 4,339,722 acres, about a quarter of Scotland, and more than the whole area of Wales, equal to eight entire English counties—Beds, Berks, Bucks, Cambridge, Cheshire, Derby, Cornwall, and Cumberland.
Twenty owners hold more than 120,000 acres each.
Twenty-four owners hold more than 4,931,888 acres (a fourth of Scotland).
Seventy owners hold about 9,400,000 acres (a half of Scotland).
One hundred and seventy-one owners hold about 11,029,228 acres.
Three hundred and thirty owners hold about two-thirds of all Scotland.
Seventeen hundred owners hold about nine-tenths of all Scotland.

Now we come to Ireland:

In Ireland, where the total area is 20,159,677 acres—
One person owns 170,119 acres.
Twelve persons own 1,297,888 acres.
Three persons own over 100,000 acres each.
Fourteen persons own over 50,000 acres each.
Ninety persons own over 20,000 acres each.
One hundred and thirty-five persons own over 10,000 acres each.
Four hundred and fifty-two persons own over 5,000 acres each.
Two hundred and ninety-two persons own 6,458,100 acres (nearly one-third of the island).
Seven hundred and forty-four persons own 9,612,728 acres (nearly one-half of the island).
One thousand nine hundred and forty-two persons own two-thirds of the whole island.

In Ireland the total number of people who hold land is 68,716. Of that number 36,141 own less than an acre; 6,892 own less than 10 acres. The total holdings of less than 10 acres are 43,033 out of 67,816. In 1881 the population was 5,174,836. There were 547,222 tenants. Fifty-two per cent. of the owners have less than an acre, and 1 man in 79 is an owner. Why, Mr. President, 74 per cent. of the people who are put down as farmers in this country live on their own farms, and 8 per cent. only of the entire farming population—I do not speak of the owners, but of the men who are classed as farmers, who are cultivating the land for themselves and not as laborers—only 8 per cent. of them pay a cash rent, while 18 per cent. of the others farm upon shares; a common and reputable and respectable and, I will say, profitable way for a farmer who has not got the money to buy a farm to cultivate.

Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator the statistics as to the amount of land owned by corporations in Ireland, England, and Scotland?

Mr. TELLER. I have not got them convenient. The tables could be found here after some examination, but I did not attempt to eliminate that from the general mass of information about land found in these works.

Mr. President, I do not intend to spend very much time over this question. I repeat that I have not called the attention of the Senate and the country to these facts because I am a disbeliever in the virtue of land to the masses. I would like to see the uneasy, disturbed, dissatisfied laborers of the country upon the land, even though each might have but a small holding. I realize that there is nothing so civilizing, there is nothing of such a conservative tendency as the ownership of the soil; and they are the happiest and the best and the most prosperous people where the greatest percentage of the population wring their living from the soil. I am not disposed myself to throw any obstacle in the way of the distribution of the public lands to the people, but I do desire to see what little is left, not so little as some people suppose, occupied by the men who want to occupy it for the purposes of a home.

Mr. GEORGE. Allow me to ask a question there that I suppose the Senator is familiar with. Can he state approximately how much agricultural land is now owned by the United States?

Mr. TELLER. I wish I could answer that question. I have made some effort in two branches of the public service to determine that fact. There are no data by which it can be determined. It is largely a subject of guess. I saw the statement made recently in a semi-official report by a commission that there were 700,000,000 acres of land in this country that could be irrigated if we had water, but that there was water only for about 30,000,000 acres. Mr. President, that is the veriest guess in the world. There is no man who is to-day qualified to speak authoritatively upon that subject, I do not care what his experience may have been. The Government has taken no step to determine how much of its lands can be irrigated, how much water there is to put upon the lands, and any attempt to state it is a mere guess. Neither has the Government taken any steps to segregate on its books the land that is arable from the non-arable land, from the mountains, from the declivities, and from the character of land that can not be cultivated.

Mr. GEORGE. Can the Senator give an approximate estimate as to the amount of arable land now owned by the Government that can be cultivated without irrigation, depending on the seasons only?

Mr. TELLER. The latest estimate I have seen has placed it at about 200,000,000 acres. It must be very largely in excess of that, because there is nearly that already that has been surveyed and stands upon our books as arable land. It must be twice that. But how much there is will never be determined until you determine first how much of it can be cultivated without irrigation. When that is determined, then you may divide the arable land from the non-arable, because you can have then the opportunity of determining how much water there is.

It is only a few years ago that it was said all the arable land had been taken in the Salt Lake Valley; that no more could be taken. Fifteen years ago, I think, that statement was made publicly everywhere. Year after year the Mormons have brought their great immigration and put it out upon those arid lands and have brought water to them and have made them produce crops. It is a fact that irrigation increases the water in every stream. It fills up the earth. When you suppose you have taken all the water from a stream going up toward its head and taking it all out so that none of it runs down the river, in a few years springs will break out on the hills and the sides of the country that is the watershed, it will fill the streams again with a large amount of water; other ditches go out, and thus the streams continue to increase from the very fact that the whole earth becomes a storehouse for water.

The great Salt Lake, near Salt Lake City, increased its area 17 per cent., largely attributed by scientific men who have examined it to the increased amount of rainfall by virtue of irrigating the fields adjacent to the lake and on the streams above. I do not pretend myself to know whether the rainfall is increasing so rapidly, as is said, but I do know the fact that to-day there are settlements in a region of country that twenty-five years ago when I went across the continent no man believed was capable of raising a spear of wheat or an ear of corn. Now there are flourishing communities there, raising crops year after year successfully, with all the appliances of civilization, bringing it from what we believed to be an inhospitable soil at that time. So no man can say we have little or much yet until the Government shall take pains to examine.

But in every portion of the country we have yet millions of acres of land waiting for the farmer's hand. The great State of Texas with its 170,000,000 acres of land has but 36,000,000 in farms to-day. It is true that some of it may be in cattle ranches, that some men may have large areas devoted to grazing, but the cattle interest will disappear before the approaching farmer. It can be demonstrated that wherever the country will sustain a farmer, cattle-raising will cease to be profitable as soon as there is a farmer there ready and willing to take the soil and till it. So we may say that these great regions devoted in our imagination to great cattle ranches will disappear, and they will be covered, as Western Kansas and Eastern Colorado are being covered to-day, by farms of 160 and 320 acres. "Why," said a gentleman, a friend of mine from Texas, a member of the other House, to me within a week, "I can point to you in Texas as good land as the sun ever shone on waiting for the settler; 25 miles you may ride at a time and not see a house;" and yet we are told that there are no homes for the homeless, no lands for the landless!

I want the people who labor and toil to understand that the great West is not yet occupied, it is not touched. Of Colorado, with its 66,000,000 acres, less than 5,000,000 in 1880 had been subjected to private ownership. There are millions of acres of both land and water, as there are in Idaho, as there are in Nevada, as there are in Oregon, and Washington, and Montana, and Dakota, waiting for the settler.

The bill that the committee has presented is not in all its details satisfactory to me, but I believe, on the whole, it is a proper bill, and will accomplish that which we had all set out to do—to save, as far as practicable, the public land for the homeless.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] asked me something about corporations, and I know it has been a subject of complaint that in this country we have allowed great corporations to control immense areas of land. We gave to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company an empire in extent; we gave another empire to other railroads to cross the continent—to the Atlantic and Pacific and to the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific; and before that we gave an empire in area in the States of Iowa, Minnesota, Michigan, and Illinois. Where is the land that was held by the corporations in the four States I have last named?

The corporations have parted with their title, as the Northern Pacific and these other companies will in due time. When settlers want the land they will get it, and they will get it on fair and profitable terms. We need not anticipate that the railroad companies in this country will become the great landed proprietors and rent out their lands. That system can not be made profitable in this country, and the companies are too poor to do it. The Union Pacific Railroad Company to-day would be glad to dispose of its land; the Northern Pacific Railroad Company would be glad to dispose of its land; all these companies are anxious to dispose of their lands; and I am glad that such is the condition of affairs that they can not keep their lands. I think that it would have been a wise provision when we built these great railroads if we had indorsed their bonds and kept the lands. It is too late to raise that question now. The simple question is, what shall we do with what is left? Let us save it and keep it for the settler; let us save it and keep it for the people who want homes of their own, whether they be American citizens or whether they be those whom we have invited to our borders.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I understand the question before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] which proposes to attach a covenant or condition to the patent that no man shall ever hold more than 640 acres of what are called desert lands; that is to say, it shall run with the patent. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is to apply that to all land. That I presume, however, is merely by way of exhibiting the character of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The question of land tenure is certainly a very large one, much too large to be discussed in this way and upon this bill. I do not see how it is possible under our form of government for the United States Congress to attach a condition to a sale of land which shall operate to deprive a State government of its power over the subject.

It is true that the United States, as any other proprietor of lands, may attach conditions to every sale of land running with the land, but it is also true that it can attach no condition to a sale which will be operative to divest the State authority of its control over the subject, and it is equally clear that it is not among the powers granted to the General Government to prescribe the conditions of land tenure in the States, or the quantities of land that may be held by individuals. For that reason I shall vote against any amendment of that description without committing myself on the question of the policy as a matter of economy of some limitations upon landtenure.

It is quite clear that whenever the land of a country becomes concentrated into the hands of a few individuals, whenever its franchises are concentrated in the hands of a few persons, whenever the right of taxation upon transportation and locomotion by whatever means is vested in a few individuals, that country can no longer be a republican country. The power of controlling the lives and fortunes of men must result in one of two things, either in a revolution by which the great majority who are controlled will throw off the control or in a complete submission to their wishes.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has presented some figures from the census in relation to a subject to which I made reference some days ago, but these figures are wholly illusive and evidence nothing upon the subject. It is the proportion, it is the relative number and amount of interest of the persons owning and those not owning land that must indicate whether there is anything in the apprehension felt by well-informed men upon this subject.

The statement that I read was a correct one, and it evidenced the fact that there was a larger number of persons in this country who cultivated the soil as tenants without ownership of land than in either Ireland, Scotland, or England or France. The question was whether in this country, where land existed in such vast and almost unlimited quantities, within the first one hundred years or within a very short period after the first century of our national existence the land of the country, whether in small bodies or large bodies, was vested in a comparatively small proportion of the great population of this country, whether it did not evidence that there was a tendency to leading a large and a vastly more numerous portion of the agricultural laborers into the condition of mere tenants than was desirable, and whether, in connection with that, the manifest growth of corporate power in which by the estimation of figures reasonably certain, and in the opinion of the Senator from Texas, in which I concur, the error in which was evidently against and not in favor of the people, when one-fifth the entire accumulated wealth of this country was vested in the hands of corporations, and when a debt, which is in all respects a public debt, to be paid in taxes, exceeding the war debt had been incurred without representation and without the consent or recognition of the national Congress or the taxing power of the States—whether these things taken together did not import a change in the character of our institutions and a condition of things economically which threatened danger to the country. And when it was found by the census and by the reports of the Labor Bureau made here that more than one million able-bodied laboring people in this country were without employment or the means of subsistence from their labor during the past year, is there not something that required the attention of statesmen and legislators?

This is the statement I presented from the North American Review:

* * * * * * * *

At the census of 1880 there were found to be 1,024,601 farms rented by tenants in the United States. That figure alone entitles America to take rank as possessing the largest tenant-farming class now furnished by any nation—a strange singularity for a nation, one of whose proudest boasts is that the old feudal institution of landlordism has obtained no foothold on her free soil! But to bring it nearer to the actual truth, that figure must be made bigger still. In the five years since the census was taken, it is a modest and well-considered calculation that the number of tenant-holdings has increased 25 per cent.

This would raise the number of tenant-holdings at present in the United States to a million and a quarter. In Great Britain and Ireland, the countries that have clung most tenaciously to the aristocratic system, the number of tenant-holdings, according to statistics obtained during the late Parliament, is as follows: In Ireland, 547,222; in England and Wales, 414,804; in Scotland, 80,101; total, 1,069,127. Thus the United States, at the present day, posesses a quarter of a million more tenant-farmers paying rent to landlords than the three kingdoms and the principality together. It contains more than three times as many as England and Wales, and more than twice as many as landlord-ridden Ireland.

In the State of Illinois alone, which is neither an old Eastern nor a Southern State, there are, with a less population, nearly twenty thousand more tenant-farmers than there are in the ancient feudal kingdom of Scotland. By the next time the census is taken the probability is the number of tenant-farmers in the United States, increasing in pace with the population, will be up to a million and a half. And from that onward, for reasons which will appear, the ratio of increase in tenancies will be greater than ever.

Going a little further into the figures of the census, we find that the total number of persons engaged in agriculture in the United States five years ago was 7,670,493; of this number 2,984,306 are registered as normal owners of their holdings, the remainder being tenants paying rent to landlords and agricultural laborers. Thus, at the first flush, the census shows the popular notion that the agricultural classes of the United States own the soil they till to be incorrect. In France, on the other hand, where the feudal system is not yet eradicated, out of a population twelve millions less than that of the United States, there are in round numbers 5,000,000 rural proprietors, each holding less than 20 acres (from 1 to 6 hectares apiece), and cultivating the land with their own hands; while there are 2,000,000 of a class comprising owners of holdings larger than 20 acres, landlords, and owners of house property in towns.

It is a suggestive fact—to go no deeper than the surface of these figures—that France, with her expensive and restricted soil, has been able to place more than five million thrifty agriculturists in absolute proprietorship of their small holdings, while America, on her boundless virgin area, unhampered by title-deeds or traditions of past proprietorial rights, with her ever-growing population hungry for land, has been unable to establish quite three millions of proprietors, both great and small. And it is to be noted that the ratio of working proprietors of land in France is steadily increasing, and that of the tenants and landlords is steadily diminishing, while the reverse is true of the United States.

* * * * * * * *

But it is no longer a question of untold millions of acres of public domain. It is no longer a question for to-morrow, it is a question for to-day. The pressure has already come. For all practical purposes of bestowing free farms on its growing population, the public domain of the United States is now exhausted.

According to the reports of the Land Office, the diminution of the public domain, by all methods, fraudulent and lawful, under the homestead and preemption, the timber-culture, the desert, and other land acts, is taking place at the rate of 20,000,000 acres a year. And according to the same reports there are just 5,000,000 acres of the public domain still left of a character that makes them available for settlers without capital.

Said the Land Commission, report of 1880: "It was estimated, June 30, 1879, that (exclusive of certain lands in the Southern States) of lands over which the survey and disposition laws had been extended, lying in the West, the United States did not own, of arable agricultural public lands, which could be cultivated without irrigation or other artificial appliances, more than the area of the present State of Ohio, namely, 25,576,960 acres." Of this arable land about 7,000,000 acres were taken up in the year ending June, 1880.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, that these things are not unworthy of consideration, and I find that not long ago, in the year 1883, the following testimony was given by a person who has attained very considerable eminence—a person, whatever may be said of his views or the correctness of his theories, who is unquestionably a man of research and distinguished ability, and who is now a living power among some four or five hundred thousand laboring men associated together and exercising a vast and controlling power over many of the domestic interests and many of the great transportation lines of our country. I refer to Mr. Henry George. He stated facts which no doubt are correct, and which I know to be true with respect to some of the States. He said:

In Maine one man owns 750,000 acres of land, and a railroad official in California controls 550,000.

He estimates that 100,000,000 acres in two Western States are held by two hundred men.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator what he reads from?

Mr. CALL. I read from the testimony taken before the Committee on Education and Labor in 1883, page 344 of the first volume, and these statements have been made everywhere. They are made upon the basis of the census.

It appears that there are between five and six millions of people engaged in agriculture in this country who are without interest in the land. I am not here to discuss the question how far that is inconsistent with the present or with the future safety or sound economical condition of the country, but I am free to say that it is an anomalous and a significant fact when taken in connection with the vast power of corporations, when taken in connection with the fact that a power of taxation greater than that possesssd by the National Government or the States exists by virtue of their corporate power upon every day's labor, upon the clothing and food of every man, woman, and child in this country.

The natural and social law that aggregates wealth, aggregates property, and controls vast franchises with powers of taxation more valuable than any gift of lands or title of nobility ever given in the past history of the world is a most significant and important thing for the consideration of those who believe in and desire a republican government, the equality of the people, and the equal rights of all men to control the public power.

But, Mr. President, this bill is a very important bill, and I have here a communication frem the General Land Office, which ought to be carefully considered and weighed before this bill shall receive the assent of this body. I will read a short analysis of it prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in response to the committee of the House, which with the accompanying letter ought to be considered by the Senate in order that we may determine by a careful examination of the bill how far its provisions are justly subject to the objections which he makes:

The bill as reported to the Senate, 2299, differs from the original bill, 1296, materially, as follows:

1. A proviso is added to the second section (page 3, lines 13, 14, 15, 16) repealing the requirement "that not less than twenty-seven hundred trees were planted on each acre."

2. Sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, amending the desert-land laws, omit the requirement of residence found in the original bill, leave the quantity of land that may be entered as now provided, namely, 640 acres, but provisions are incorporated in sections 5 and 7 of the bill as reported which enables proof to be made by and authorizes patents to be issued to the assignees of entrymen, thus doing away with the restriction in the present law which limits desert-land entries to the quantity of 640 acres to each person. Under the provisions of this section a single person or corporation may obtain title to all the land he or the corporation choose to cause to be entered, since the privilege of assigning an entry is equivalent to allowing a party as many entries as he wishes. It will only be necessary for cattle companies or speculative combinations to obtain entries through their employés or persons hired for the occasion, and obtain assignments from them.

The provision referred to, therefore, opens all unentered lands in California, Oregon, Nevada, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, Arizona, New Mexico, Dakota, and Colorado to private purchase, without limit of quantity to the purchaser, at $1.25 per acre. It removes forever the possibility of the acquirement of those lands from the Government for homes for the people, and places the fee of a territorial empire in the hands of cattle barons and land monopolists.

The provision legalizing the assignment of desert-land entries is also extended to the entries already made, thus protecting the willful frauds by which great bodies of land have already been covered up.

The amended bill does not make desert entries homestead entries in character as provided in the original bill, and hence the provisions of section 8 do not apply to such entries, but an equivalent result is obtained through the legalization of assignments.

The provisions respecting reclamation, improvement, and cultivation are prima facie, but it will be wholly impossible to enforce them. With great areas of land covered by such entries and dominated by the interests in which they are made; with no inhabitants upon stock ranges, and no person to testify to the character of land or of compliance with requirements except employés of the companies controlling the land, it is plain that all conditions and requirements can be easily and successfully evaded.

A provision in section 8 of the amended bill which was also in the original bill was inadvertently not remarked upon in Commissioner's letter to Mr. COBB. It is that patents are required to be issued in all cases after the entry has been made for two years if there is at that time no pending contest or protest. This provision secures patents upon all, even the most notoriously fraudulent entries, after two years, if no private person contests or protests. Under this provision it would only be necessary that the facilities of the Government to examine entries should be inadequate to the work in order to save and protect all frauds which some individual person should not challenge, and a simple withdrawal of a contest or protest would save and protect even such incidental cases.

Section 6 (not noted in previous letter) adds to existing law (section 2288, Revised Statutes) a provision authorizing transfers of entries for canals and ditches. As the right of way for these purposes is already provided for by law (section 2339, Revised Statutes) the amendment is unnecessary unless it is to be used, as it probably would be, to enable assignments of entries to be made for the ostensible purpose of ditches but really to acquire title to lands in excess of statutory limitations.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The committee instructed the Senator who has the bill in charge to strike out the words "assignees," &c., as to desert-land entries. That had escaped the attention of the committee until this letter came up. So that objection will be obviated. The lands are not assignable, and it was not intended that they should be.

Mr. CALL. That objection is obviated. It is perhaps due to the Commissioner, whose conduct has been severely criticised, that I read something from the communication which he has addressed to a member of the House of Representatives, a copy of which he has sent to me. He says:

In my annual report I have set forth some of the evidences before this office showing that a great majority of pre-emption entries are frauds upon the public domain and frauds upon actual settlers. This was no new development. My predecessors had represented to Congress the fact that great frauds were perpetrated upon the pre-emption law. In 1882 my immediate predecessor stated that, as indicated by correspondence and official reports, "a material proportion of the pre-emption entries now made are fraudulent in character, being chiefly placed upon valuable timber or mineral lands or water rights, and made in the interest and by the procurement of others, and not for the purpose of residence and improvement by the professed pre-emptor.

In 1883 he made a special report to Congress (Senate Ex. Doc. No. 61, Forty-seventh Congress, second session), in which he said:

Complaints of frauds and appeals for protection by bona fide settlers from the exactions and oppressions of those who commit or cause these frauds to be committed are constantly coming up to this office. A flood tide of illegal appropriation seems to be sweeping over the new States and Territories threatening to engulf the entire public domain.

In my report for 1885 I stated:

"Reports of special agents, registers and receivers, and inspectors of surveyors-general and local land offices, communications from United States attorneys and other officials, and letters from public men and private citizens throughout the country were laid before me, all detailing one common story of widespread, persistent public land robbery committed under guise of the various forms of public land entry.

"In many sections of the country, notably throughout regions dominated by cattle-raising interests—the vast area lying west of the ninety-ninth meridian—examinations, wherever made, had developed at all points that entries were chiefly fictitious and fraudulent, and made in bulk through concerted methods adopted by organizations that had parceled out the country among themselves and were maintaining seized possessions of unentered lands by boundaries and inclosures defended by armed riders and protected against immigration and settlement by systems of espionage and intimidation.

"In other cases, as in farming regions approximate to the cattle belt, it was shown that individual speculation, following the progress of public surveys, was covering townships of agricultural land with entries made for the purpose of selling the claims to others, or by entries procured for the acquisition of lands in large bodies.

"Again, in timbered regions, the forests were being appropriated by domestic and foreign corporations through suborned entries made in fraud and evasion of law. Newly discovered coal-fields were being seized and possessed in like manner."

The universality of fraud in pre-emption entries of public lands is a matter of general knowledge and common notoriety. The Senate committee, reporting in favor of the repeal of the pre-emption law, quote from Senate report of the Forty-eighth Congress:

"Another reason for the repeal of this law is the alarming increase of fraudulent claims under it in late years, owing to the greater demand for, and increased value of, the lands, the discontinuance of public sales, and the withdrawal of lands from private entry."

And again:

We adopt the following, quoted from Report 1544 from the House Committee on the Public Lands at the first session of the present Congress, to accompany the bill under consideration:

"Whole townships of the public domain have been acquired under this law by capitalists who do not reside within hundreds of miles of the land, and never did. They have secured them through paid agents in their employ, who receive so much for their services when they make the proof necessary to entitle them to a patent from the Government, and assign their claims to their employers. This is done, of course, through perjury and subornation of perjury.

"For each one of these agents or claimants is required to make settlement on the pre-emption claim under the law, and he must make oath before the register or receiver of the land district in which the lands are situate, on which he claims to have settled for the purpose of pre-empting, and that he has never had the benefit of any right of pre-emption; that he has not settled upon and improved such land to sell the same on speculation, but in good faith to appropriate it to his own exclusive use, and that he has not directly or indirectly made any agreement or contract in any way or manner with any person whatsoever by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person except himself. And yet it is well known that this oath is daily taken by parties who make it under contracts such as we have indicated above. They file with the register of the proper land district their declaration, make their proof, affidavit, and payment required by the law, and receive their title, and transfer the same to the parties with whom they made the contract before they attempted to make the pre-emption."

The proposition of the present Senate bill to confirm pre-emption entries already made and the mandatory direction to the officers of the Land Department to issue patents on such entries is therefore a proposition to confirm, validate, and legalize these fraudulent, invalid, and illegal entries. This proposition does not rest upon any assumption of the legality or good faith of the entries, but distinctly upon the ground that the claims have been sold. The condition of confirmation is simply and alone that proof of sale shall be made. All that is needed then to secure the confirmation of a fraudulent entry, or even of a fictitious entry in the name of a non-resident party, is a transfer in the name of the entryman or purported entryman.

It is assumed that this provision is but a declaration of the law which would govern a judicial determination in similar cases. If this were true no further legislation would be necessary. If not true, then it is new and novel legislation and not a declaration of existing law.

Now, Mr. President, this bill proposes to confirm all that class of entries which have been reported to the Senate as made in the interest of land monopoly, of the concentration of vast bodies of public land, which by their location control largely other great bodies of land widely extended for grazing purposes. This land, as it has been published in the New York Herald, is largely owned by foreign syndicates either in one way or another, either by mortgage or by having the title directly vested in corporate bodies.

In the State of Florida there are several hundred thousand acres of land held by parties from abroad, by foreigners. I am not here to object to that. I do not know how far in the present financial condition of the State that may not be an advantage, but the policy I do object to. I think some legislation should be had which would save the public domain for the actual settlement of the people; and however the acquisition of large bodies of land by foreigners may have introduced money into the country, however it may have advanced the present well-being of communities, it is full of calamity in the future and of menace in the present.

In regard to these desert lands, I think that this letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office should be read before this bill is acted upon, and I shall ask that it be read by the Secretary, as I think it is due to him and to his recommendations, and to a knowledge of the present bill, and its force and effect, that these very able and very concise and clear suggestions of his should be presented to and considered by the Senate.

In regard to these desert lands, as to all the lands, the homestead law of this country fixes the policy to which the Senator from Kansas adverted of a limitation upon the quantity of land to be owned by individuals. It fixes the quantity at 160 acres as a matter of policy. As a matter of power and law the Government attempted to do and did no more than to give that land in the first instance in that quantity and with 160 adjacent acres when it could be found as the quantity which as a matter of public policy it was advisable should be owned by one person or one family.

It was the theory that chiefly the soil should be cultivated by the owners of the soil. Certainly there is great difficulty in accomplishing that object; certainly it has never yet been fully accomplished. France has come nearer to it than any other people, and there is a greater amount of prosperity in that country than is to be found anywhere, not excepting our own country with its vast amount of virgin land now becoming exhausted by these lavish grants to corporations. Up to this time with this vast amount of virgin land free to everybody, with its forests open and furnishing a subsistence almost without labor to an immense number of people, many of whom have grown up from generation to generation upon the public domain without ever having owned a foot or an inch of the soil. But France with her limited area and with her lands almost entirely in quantities of from 20 to 160 acres—160 acres being a principality—is certainly the most prosperous people in the world in their domestic economy. We are better and happier because we have a wider field and land is cheaper here.

But concerning these desert lands, I should concur with any well-devised policy which might be adopted by which the land might in proper quantities be taken possession of by those who have the means to do it, the fact of its being desert and of its needing artificial aid for reclamation being established, upon the condition of reclamation, some price, some proportion to cost of profit upon it in the event of reclamation being allowed to the person making it, and some limitation placed upon exacting oppressive charges from the people. That, it seems to me, the condition of reclamation being the sole condition of title and a limitation upon excessive prices, would be the proper system to apply to that. But the opinion of the Commissioner in this letter which I shall ask to have read is that in the present state of the law as amended by this bill now proposed, which allows for a dollar and a quarter an acre any amount of this land to be acquired, the only other condition being the payment of $3 in the attempt to reclaim it, would be productive of serious injury and dispose of a large quantity of the public lands improvidently and place them beyond the reach of the people—the actual settlers—except at very high prices, beyond their ability to pay. This I think worthy of serious consideration by the Senate.

But, as I said before, I am not in favor at this time of this proposed interference with what will be doubtless the proper subject of future legislation by the States in deciding whether or not a limit shall be fixed to the ownership of the land; and, if so, what limit. I am not in favor of an amendment which proposes to make a condition and covenant running with the land, a condition of land tenure placed beyond the power of the State governments to regulate and control. I do not think we have the power to do that, and if we had the power to do it, it would be a very unwise exercise of it to continue a law for this State which might not suit it, and the same law for another State, with a dense population and different condition, which might perhaps demand it.

I now ask the Secretary to read the remainder of that communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read, but was interrupted by,

Mr. CALL. With the consent of the Senate I ask that that may be printed in the RECORD without reading. I only desire to present the view of the Commissioner in order that it may receive consideration here.

Mr. INGALLS. Has the Senator read the communication himself so that he is able to say it is respectful in tone and fit to be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. CALL. I have read it; and there is nothing in it that is disrespectful.

Mr. INGALLS. I have heard some observations from executive officers within a very brief time that appeared to me to be not very respectful to either House of Congress. I did not know but that this might come in the same category.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator if he thinks it respectful to those officers to ask if they will put such things in their communications to Congress?

Mr. INGALLS. It may not be respectful, but it seems to be necessary. If the Senator vouches for it, I make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the paper will be published in the RECORD.

The paper is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 12, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th ultimo, inclosing a copy of Senate bill No. 1296, and stating "that the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, in considering the House bill on the same subject, desire my opinion thereon, particularly in respect to the eighth section, and inviting any further suggestions I may make in connection therewith for the consideration of the committee.

H. R. 380 (to repeal the pre-emption laws, &c.), to which my attention is called in connection with S. 1296, proposes the repeal of the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws and general provisions of law authorizing public and private land sales. In so far as the Senate bill corresponds with the House bill in the matter of such repeals it appears unobjectionable. I also concur with the proposition of the Senate bill that the commutation features of the homestead laws be abolished.

But the Senate bill contains certain other features which in my judgment are at variance with established legal principles and contrary to the public interests. A proviso in the first section declares that "all entries heretofore made under the pre-emption laws, on which final proof and payment have been made, and to which there are no adverse claims and which have been sold to innocent purchasers, shall be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the proper Department officer of such sale."

In my annual report I have set forth some of the evidences before this office, showing that a great majority of pre-emption entries are frauds upon the public domain and frauds upon actual settlers. This was no new development. My predecessors had represented to Congress the fact that great frauds were perpetrated upon the pre-emption law. In 1882 my immediate predecessor stated that, as indicated by correspondence and official reports, "a material proportion of the pre-emption entries now made are fraudulent in character, being chiefly placed upon valuable timber or mineral lands or water rights, and made in the interest and by the procurement of others, and not for the purpose of residence and improvement by the professed pre-emptor."

In 1883 he made a special report to Congress (Senate Executive Document No. 61, Forty-seventh Congress, second session), in which he said: "Complaints of frauds and appeals for protection by bona fide settlers from the exactions and oppressions of those who commit or cause these frauds to be committed are constantly coming up to this office. A flood-tide of illegal appropriation seems to be sweeping over the new States and Territories, threatening to ingulf the entire public domain."

In my report for 1885 I stated:

"Reports of special agents, registers and receivers, and inspectors of surveyors-general and local land offices, communications from United States attorneys and other officials, and letters from public men and private citizens throughout the country were laid before me, all detailing one common story of widespread, persistent, public-land robbery committed under guise of the various forms of public-land entry.

"In many sections of the country, notably throughout regions dominated by cattle-raising interests—that vast area lying west of the ninety-ninth meridian—examinations, wherever made, had developed at all points that entries were chiefly fictitious and fraudulent, and made in bulk through concerted methods adopted by organizations that had parceled out the country themselves and were maintaining seized possessions of unentered lands by boundaries and inclosures defended by armed riders and protected against immigration and settlement by systems of espionage and intimidation.

"In other cases, as in farming regions approximate to the cattle belt, it was shown that individual speculation, following the progress of public surveys, was covering townships of agricultural land with entries made for the purpose of selling the claims to others, or by entries procured for the acquisition of lands in large bodies. Again, in timbered regions the forests were being appropriated by domestic and foreign corporations through suborned entries made in fraud and evasion of law. Newly discovered coal fields were being seized and possessed in like manner."

The universality of fraud in pre-emption entries of public lands is a matter of general knowledge and common notoriety. The Senate committee, reporting in favor of the repeal of the pre-emption law, quote from Senate report of the Forty-eighth Congress:

"Another reason for the repeal of this law is the alarming increase of fraudulent claims under it in late years owing to the greater demand for and increased value of the lands, the discontinuance of public sales, and the withdrawal of lands from private entry."

And again:

"We adopt the following, quoted from report 1544, from the House Committee on the Public Lands, at the first session of the present Congress, to accompany the bill under consideration:

"'Whole townships of the public domain have been acquired under this law by capitalists, who do not reside within hundreds of miles of the land, and never did. They have secured them through paid agents in their employ, who receive so much for their services when they make the proof necessary to entitle them to a patent from the Government and assign their claims to their employers. This is done of course through perjury and subornation of perjury; for each one of these agents or claimants is required to make settlement on the pre-emption claim under the law, and he must make oath before the register or receiver of the land district in which the lands are situate, on which he claims to have settled for the purpose of pre-empting, and that he has never had the benefit of any right of pre-emption; that he has not settled upon and improved such land to sell the same on speculation, but in good faith to appropriate it to his own exclusive use, and that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract in any way or manner with any person whatsoever by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States should inure, in whole or in part, to the benefit of any person except himself. And yet it is well known that this oath is daily taken by parties who make it under contracts such as we have indicated above. They file with the register of the proper land district their declaration, make their proof, affidavit, and payment required by the law, and receive their title, and transfer the same to the parties with whom they made the contract before they attempted to make the pre-emption.'

The proposition of the present Senate bill to confirm pre-emption entries already made and the mandatory direction to the officers of the Land Department to issue patents on entries is therefore a proposition to confirm, validate, and legalize these fraudulent, invalid, and illegal entries. This proposition does not rest upon any assumption of the legality or good faith of the entries, but distinctly upon the ground that the claims have been sold. The condition of confirmation is simply and alone that proof of sale shall be made. All that is needed then to secure the confirmation of a fraudulent entry, or even of a fictitious entry in the name of a non-existent party, is transfer in the name of the entryman or purported entryman.

It is assumed that this provision is but a declaration of the law which would govern a judicial determination in similar cases. If this were true no further legislation would be necessary. If not true, then it is new and novel legislation and not a declaration of existing law.

The pre-emption law provides that "if any person taking such oath swears falsely in the premises he shall forfeit the money which he may have paid for such land and all right and title to the same; and any grant or conveyance which he may have made, except in the hands of bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration, shall be null and void, except as provided in section 2288."

The exception in this provision has never been regarded by the courts or by this Department as referring to the rights of purchasers as against the United States, but only as to obligations between vendor and vendee.

As against the United States the purchaser takes only what his vendor has to convey. In Yost vs. Shields (1 Woolworth, 353), the court said:

"It is further insisted on behalf of the defendants that they are bona fide purchasers, and that they, as such, are entitled to the protection of the court. I think it pretty clear that some at least of these defendants purchased and paid their money without any knowledge in fact of any defect in the title. Yet they are not bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice in the sense in which the terms are employed in courts of equity. And this for several reasons:

"They all purchased before the issue of the patent. The more meritorious purchased after the entry had been assailed and decided against by the Land Office But this is a circumstance not material to this consideration. Until the issue of the patent the legal title remained in the United States. Had his entry been valid, Shields would have taken only an equity. His grantees took only an equity. They did not acquire the legal title. And in order to establish in himself the character of a bona fide purchaser, so as to be entitled to the protection of chancery, a party must show that in his purchase and by the conveyance to him, he acquired the legal title. * * * After he had gone through with the process of making the entry, after he received the patent certificate, Shields had no more right or title or interest in the land than he had before. As he had none he could convey no interest in the land. By the deed which he made and by the successive deeds which they received, his grantees took no more than he had, which was nothing at all."

This is a declaration of the law which governs judicial determinations in all this class of cases. It is the law itself as declared by all authorities on jurisprudence, and as settled by legal opinions and judicial decisions from the earliest period of the general pre-emption system to the present day. In 1836 Mr. Attorney-General Butler (3 Op., 92) said:

"The assignee of the pre-emption certificate (supposing it, for the purposes of this opinion, to be assignable) takes it subject to all the equities existing between the original parties—the United States and the settler to whom it was given—even though he had no notice of such equities at the time of the assignment and payment of the purchase-money; and that he can acquire a specific execution of the engagement contained in the pre-emption laws, on no other terms than could have been insisted on by his assignor, the original vendee.

"The error of the argument in favor of the assignee consists in assuming that the equities of the parties are merely equal, and that the legal title is in the assignee. The legal title, until letters patent shall have issued, is in the United States; and if their equity is merely equal to that of the assignee, yet it must be preferred, because they have the legal title. The doctrine as to purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice is applicable for another reason. If this were a case in which the parties were both suable the appropriate remedy of the assignee to compel the vendor to complete the title would be a bill for a specific performance. In other words, as the United States are in possession, and refuse to convey, the assignee must necessarily be the plaintiff. But a purchase for a valuable consideration, without notice, is not ground on which to maintain a suit. It can only be used as a defense; it is a mere shield, and not a weapon of attack.

"In all cases of this sort the rule caveat emptor is particularly applicable; and if the assignee has chosen to part with his money without providing suitable means of indemnification to meet the contingency of a failure of title in his assignor, he must submit to the consequences of his indiscretion."

In a recent decision by this Department (R. M. Chrisinger, 4 L. D., 347), the honorable Secretary of the Interior said:

"It is insisted by counsel and ably argued at length that the assignees of Chrisinger, being bona fide purchasers after entry, are entitled to intervene and have their interests protected, as they took without notice of any defect in the final proof.

"This proposition is not tenable. It involves the principle that although the claim for title while in the hands of the entryman is worthless on account of his failure to comply with the law, such claim may be strengthened and made a matter of absolute right by virtue of a transfer to an innocent purchaser. The converse of this, however, is true. Conceding the right of sale after the issuance of final certificate and prior to patent, the purchaser takes no better claim for title than the entryman has to confer, and whatever right is thus acquired is subject to the subsequent action of the Land Department."

It is obviously proper to apply the same rule to the Government in the matter of pre-emption claims that regulates the transfer of property from one individual to another. That rule is caveat emptor. It is uniformly so applied.

In the case of Whitaker vs. Railroad Company (7 Copp., 86), it was said by this Department under Mr. Secretary Schurz:

"In all cases of purchases of pre-empted lands before the issuance of patents therefor the rule caveat emptor is particularly applicable; and if the entries are fraudulent or void the purchasers acquire nothing. And it has been held in cases of entries under the early pre-emption laws having like provisions to those of section 13, act of 1844, and section 2262 Revised Statutes, as well as under later acts, that the doctrine of bona fide purchaser is not applicable to one who purchases of a pre-emptor before patent, and that such purchasers must abide by the disposition of the cases by your office or this Department, that they take no better title than their vendors have, and that your office and the Department had full authority to cancel pre-emption entries for invalidity or fraud. The foregoing conclusions will be found to be fully supported by the following authorities, the numerous decisions cited in United States Digest, volume 14, page 59, paragraph 1242, especially:

"Barnes vs. Childs, 10 Peters, 179, and Vattier vs. Hinde, 5 Peters, 271; Arnold vs. Grimes and Chapman, 2 Iowa (Clarke's) Rep., 99; Anketel vs. Convers, 17 O. It must be conceded that the law is well settled that the same rule not only ought to be applied but is applied to the Government that regulates the transfer of private property from one individual to another. What is sought by spoliators of the public domain is to induce Congress to ingraft in the statutes the principle that the Government cannot avail itself of the common rules of law applicable to transfers of property between individuals, to assert the somewhat exploded doctrine that the United States has no power to protect its own property.

In private transactions bona fide purchasers for value after deed are protected. So in respect of public lands. Bona fide purchasers for value, after patent, are protected. But neither in private nor in public transactions can purchasers before deed or patent demand a conveyance from the legal owner of the property, nor do they possess the character or have the standing of bona fide purchasers.

It is clear that a proposition to confirm entries that have been sold before patent is not a declaration of the law that would govern a judicial determination in such cases, but is a declaration that overthrows fundamental legal principles.

In the light of these principles it is possible that the clauses referred to in the first section of the Senate bill defeats itself, since as the purchaser of a pre-emption claim before patent is not an "innocent purchaser" there could legally be no confirmation under a clause confining confirmations to purchasers of that class.

The eighth section of the bill provides:

"That in all cases under the pre-emption and homestead acts all contests or protests on the part of the Government or any individual concerning the land to be entered shall be instituted within ninety days after the duplicate receiver's receipt is issued, and not thereafter."

The Government has no facilities for ascertaining within ninety days whether an entry is made by a qualified party or upon lands subject to entry, or whether the laws have been complied with. There is usually no knowledge at this office of the existence of such entry until a much longer period has elapsed, since it is several months before entries are posted upon the records and it may be months longer before an examination can be made to ascertain whether even upon the face of the papers an entry is presumptively allowable. Information which would place the Government upon inquiry in respect to the merits of a claim can not be expected to be furnished pro bono publico within ninety days or any other fixed period, and no facilities exist through which the information can be officially obtained within any such period.

Contestants and protestants can not be expected to appear within that period, nor can any period be fixed when their rights would terminate so long as the legal title to the land remains in the United States and they have not been heard.

Should this bill become a law, the valid prior right of honest settlers upon public lands would be placed at the mercy of whoever might get an entry of record before they did and without their knowledge. Executive action being estopped at the expiration of a certain time, the only guard against fraudulent entries and entries made to fraudulently seize the possessions and improvements of actual settlers would be the brief period in which the Government or the settler could obtain information of the wrong. It is my judgment that such provision would amount to a confiscation of actual settlement rights, and that the easy terms upon which executive supervision is concluded would invite fraudulent and fictitious entries ad libitum.

It would further give a standing of validity to entries that might be made on Indian or military reservations, on lands granted to railroads, or for schools or internal improvements, or upon any other lands reserved from entry by law or claimed by adverse right. It is not my opinion that either the public safety or the private rights of citizens should be stricken down in this summary manner.

The first proviso of the eighth section is:

"That whenever it shall appear upon the face of the papers returned to the Commissioner's office that a clerical error has been committed, said Commissioner shall have power to suspend such entry, upon proper notification to the claimant, through such local land office, until such error has been corrected."

As the Commissioner already has such power this proviso adds nothing to his athority and nothing to the law, unless it implies that clerical errors only shall be considered, but that as a matter of administration no consideration can be given to substantial defects.

The second proviso is:

"That after final proof of the claimant, and the issuing of the duplicate receiver's receipt, if it shall come to the knowledge of the Commissioner, before the patent has issued for the same, that fraud has entered into the title so acquired by the claimant, unless it shall appear that the land has been sold and conveyed to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, the Commissioner shall suspend the issuing of the patent for the same and file with the United States Attorney-General notice of such suspension of the patent, with his reasons therefor, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to commence proceedings at once in the proper court, by a scire facias, bill, or information, to set aside such title. This section shall apply to all cases of homestead acts."

This proviso contains three propositions, namely: First, to prohibit any inquiry into the validity of an entry after issue of receiver's receipt, and before patent upon any other ground than that of fraud; second, to prohibit any inquiry on the ground of fraud if the claim has been sold; and third, to transfer to the courts the authority of determining the validity of unsold entries challenged for fraud.

These propositions rest upon three others, namely: First, that the action of the register and receiver is conclusive except in case of frand; second, that the assignment of an entry before patent estops an inquiry into the validity of the claim even in case of fraud; and third, that an entry of public lands can be set aside for cause only by the judicial courts.

These propositions have been advanced in scores of cases before the Supreme Court of the United States and the supreme courts of the several States, and have as repeatedly been denied.

The propositions that the transfer of a claim adds anything to its efficacy against the United States, or that a certificate of purchase is in the nature of an investiture of title, or that the purchaser of an entry before patent is in any legal sense an innocent purchaser, are refuted by decisions hereinbefore cited. Many others might be referred to.

In Irvine vs. Marshall, 20 How., 555, it was held that although a certificate may be the subject of bargain and sale yet the United States can take care that conveyance shall be to him who is in good faith its vendee, and the court said:

"The reception of the certificate of purchase as evidence of title may be regular and convenient as a rule of business, but it has not been anywhere established as conclusive evidence, much less has it been adjudged to forbid or exclude proofs of the real and just rights of claimants."

A mere declaration in writing by a vendor that the vendee has paid the purchase-price of land, and that he intends to give him a deed, is not a document purporting to convey title. (Osterman vs. Baldwin, 6 Wall., 116.)

Legal title does not pass by contract of purchase without deed, and one who holds or claims by contract only is not protected as a bona fide purchaser for value. (Boone vs. Chiles, 10 Pet., 177.)

It will not do for a purchaser to close his eyes to facts which are open to his investigation for the exercise of that diligence which the law imposes. Such purchasers are not protected. (Boush vs. Wall, 15 Pet., 111.)

Purchasers by quitclaim deed even are not regarded as bona fide purchasers without notice. (Oliver vs. Piatt, 3 How., 333; May vs. Le Claire, 11 Wall., 217; Dickerson vs. Colgrove, 100 U. S., 578.)

Party without title can not acquire it by payment of taxes on land. (Homestead Co. vs. Valley R. R., 17 Wall., 153.)

A purchaser of land must look to every part of the title which is essential to its validity. (Brush vs. Ware, 15 Pet., 112.)

States have no power to declare certificates of purchase of equal dignity with a patent. (Bagnell vs. Broderick, 13 Pet., 436.)

If, before patent issues, the land department finds the entry erroneous it may treat the assignment as void, and, notwithstanding it, set the entry aside. (Franklin vs. Kelley, 2 Nebr., 79.)

"The act of 1841 provides that the entry shall be made with the register of the land office. The acts organizing the Land Department of the Government provide that the action of the register shall be subject to revision and supervision by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and entry with the register is dependent upon the approval of his superior, so far as the course and order of the business go; and, without the affirmative action of the Commissioner, the patents issue. It would be a great evil if a party claiming a pre-emption right could, as soon as his entry was made, convey the land to a third party, and thereby prevent the Commissioner from re-examining and disapproving the entry if it was erroneously allowed. Such course would expose the Government to serious loss, and pervert a statute conceived in a wise policy and a generous spirit into a means of perpetrating the greatest frauds. This is the mischief aimed at. The object was to protect the Government, and in this view the language—that the right secured by the act should not be assigned—is apt. As between the claimant and the Government, his interest is a right merely until the patent issues. It is subject to reinvestigation and, on inquiry, to be disregarded by the Department Until the patent issues, it is treated by the Government not as a title, but as a right, or a claim of right.

"I admit that if an entry under the act is made with the register, and the Commissioner finds that it was illegally allowed, as, for instance, if the entry is upon lands not subject to pre-emption, and he sets it aside, a conveyance intermediate the entry and the official act of vacating it would be void. Such a conveyance would be within the mischief. But if a valid entry be made, and a patent issued upon it, a conveyance intermediate those two acts would not be within the mischief. The issue of the patent is a confirmation of the entry; it relates back to it, and takes effect from it. (Astrom vs. Hammond, 3 McLean, 107.)"

The courts have often ruled that where the right to a patent has once become vested in a purchaser of public lands it is equivalent, so far as the Government is concerned, to a patent issued. (Stark vs. Starrs, 6 Wall, 402; Simmons vs. Wagner, 101 U. S. 260.) But none of these decisions hold that the certificate and receipt of the register and receiver is conclusive evidence that a right has vested, nor that a patent is not necessary for the conveyance of the legal title. In Myers vs. Croft, 13 Wall., 291, the court says that the pre-emptor could sell after entry if he came up and made his proof and payment "with clean hands." But he must be in good faith the owner of the land and have "done nothing inconsistent with the provisions of the law on the subject."

The validity of a conveyance depends upon the validity of the entry, and that is always a proper subject of inquiry by the Land Department at any time before patent issues, and by the courts in a proper proceeding afterward.

In the case of Harkness vs. Underhill (1 Black., 316), counsel for plaintiff urged that—

"The register and receiver having sold the land to Waters in conformity with the instructions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office had no further power or jurisdiction over it. Neither had the Commissioner of the General Land Office power to set aside the sale even for fraud. This could only be done by judicial authority."

Counsel for defendant in reply cited the language of the supreme court of Missouri in Green vs. Hill, 9 Mo., 322:

"It is the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to revise the proceedings of the register and receiver and vacate entries which may have been illegally made, and thereby arrest the completion of a title originating in fraud, mistake, or violation of law." And to the same effect: Perry vs. O'Hanlon, 11 Mo., 585; Huntsucker vs. Clark, 12 Mo., 333: Nelson vs. Simms, 23 Miss., 383;

Glen vs. Thistle, 23 Minn., 42; Mitchell vs. Cobb, 13 Ala., 137; Dickinson vs. Brown, 9 Smeade & Marshall, 130; Gray vs. McCance, 4 Ill.

The court (Mr. Justice Catron) said: "The question is again raised whether this entry having been allowed by the register and receiver could be set aside by the Commissioner.

"This question has several times been raised and decided in this court upholding the Commissioner's powers." (Garland vs. Winn, 20 How., 8, Lytle vs. The State of Arkansas, 22 How.)

In Barnard vs. Ashley (18 How., 43), the court said that the power of supervision by the Commissioner of the General Land Office "is exercised by virtue of the act of July 4, 1836, which provides 'that from and after the passage of this act the executive duties now prescribed, or which may hereafter be prescribed by law appertaining to the survey and sale of the public lands of the United States, or in any wise respecting such public lands, and also such as relate to private claims of land and the issuing of patents for all grants of land under the authority of the Government of the United States, shall be subject to the supervision and control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the President of the United States.'

"The necessity of 'supervision and control,' vested in the Commissioner acting under the direction of the President, is too manifest to require comment, further than to say that the facts found in this record show that nothing is more easily done than apparently to establish, by ex parte affidavits, cultivation and possession of particular quarter-sections of lands, when the fact is untrue. That the act of 1836 modifies the powers of registers and receivers to the extent of the Commissioner's action in the instance before us, we hold to be true. But if the construction of the act of 1836 to this effect were doubtful, the practice under it for nearly twenty years could not be disturbed without manifest impropriety.

"The case relied on, of Wilcox vs. Jackson, 13 Pet., 511, was an ejectment suit, commenced in February 1836; and as to the acts of the register and receiver, in allowing the entry in that case, the Commissioner had no power of supervision, such as was given to him by act of July 4, 1836, after the case was in court.

"In the next case, 9 How., 333, all the controverted facts on which both sides relied had transpired and were concluded before the act of July 4, 1836, was passed; and therefore its construction, as regards the Commissioner's powers under the act of 1836 was not involved. Whereas, in the case under consideration, the additional proceedings were had before the register and receiver in 1837, and were subject to the new powers conferred on the Commissioner.

"In Vaquire vs. Tyler (1 Black, 195), the court recognized and affirmed the 'plenary powers conferred upon the Commissioner by the act of July 4, 1836,' and said that the power of the Secretary of the Interior under the act of March 3, 1849, to revise on appeal is 'necessarily coextensive with the powers to adjudge by the Commissioner.'"

In Shepley vs. Cowan (91 U. S., 340), the court say:

"The officers of the Land Department are specially designated by law to receive, consider, and pass upon proofs presented with respect to settlement upon the public lands with a view to secure the rights of pre-emption. If they err in the construction of the law applicaple to any case, or if fraud is practiced upon them, or they themselves are chargeable with fraudulent practices, their rulings may be reviewed and annulled by the courts when a controversy arises between private parties founded upon their decisions.

In Marquiz vs. Frisbie (101 United States, 475), the court say:

"We have repeatedly held that the courts will not interfere with the officers of the Government while in the discharge of their duties in disposing of the public lands, either by injunction or mandamus. (Litchfield vs. Register and Receiver, 9 Wool., 552; Gaines vs. Thompson, 7 Id., 347; The Secretary vs. McGarrahan, 9 Id., 289.)

"After the United States has parted with its title and the individual has become vested with it, the equities subject to which he holds it may be enforced, but not before. (Johnson vs. Towsley, 13 Id., 72; Shefley vs. Cowan, 91 U. S., 330.)

"We did not deny the right of the courts to deal with the possession of the land prior to the issue of the patent or to enforce contracts between the parties concerning the land. But it is impossible thus to transfer a title which is yet in the United States."

In the United States vs. Schurz (102 United States, 395), the court say:

"The Constitution of the United States declares that Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States. Under this provision the sale of the public lands was placed by statute under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. To aid him in the performance of this duty a bureau was created, at the head of which is the Commissioner of the General Land Office with many subordinates. To them, as a special tribunal, Congress confided the executing of the laws which regulate the surveying, the selling, and the general care of these lands."

Congress has also enacted a system of laws by which "rights to these lands may be acquired and the title of the Government conveyed to the citizens. This court has with a strong hand upheld the doctrine that so long as the legal title of these lands remained in the United States, and the proceedings for acquiring it were as yet infieri, the courts would not interfere to control the exercise of the power vested in their tribunal. To that doctrine we still adhere."

And again (Id., 401): "The question whether any particular tract belonging to the Government was open to sale, pre-emption, or homestead right is in every instance a question of law as applied to the facts for the determination of those officers."

In Quinby vs. Cowlan (104 U. S., 420) the court say:

"The laws of the United States prescribe with particularity the manner in which portions of the public domain may be acquired by settlers. They require personal settlement upon the lands desired and their inhabitation and improvement, and a declaration of the settler's acts and purposes to be made in the proper office of the district within a limited time after the public surveys have been extended over the lands. By them a land department has been created to supervise all the various steps required for the acquisition of the title of the Government. Its officers are required to receive, consider, and pass upon the proofs furnished as to the alleged settlements upon the lands, and their improvement when pre-emption rights are claimed, and, in case of conflicting claims to the same tract, to hear the contesting parties.

"The proofs offered in compliance with the law are to be presented, in the first instance, to the officers of the district where the land is situated, and from their decision an appeal lies to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and from him to the Secretary of the Interior. For mere errors of judgment as to the weight of evidence on these subjects by any of the subordinate officers the only remedy is by an appeal to his superior of the Department. The courts can not exercise any direct appellate jurisdiction over the rulings of those officers or of their superior in the Department in such matters, nor can they reverse or correct them in a collateral proceeding between private parties.

"In this case, the allegation that false and fraudulent representations as to the settlement of the plaintiff were made to the officers of the Land Department is negatived by the finding of the court. It would lead to endless litigation and be fruitful of evil if a supervisory power were vested in the courts over the action of the numerous officers of the Land Department on the mere questions of fact presented for their determination. It is only when those offisers have misconstrued the law applicable to the case as established before the Department, and thus have denied to parties rights which, upon a correct construction, would have been conceded to them, or where misrepresentations and fraud have been practiced necessarily affecting their judgment, that the courts can in a proper proceeding interfere and refuse to give effect to their action. On this subject we have repeatedly and with emphasis expressed our opinion, and the matter should be deemed settled. (Johnson vs. Towsley, 13 Wall., 72; Shepley vs. Cowan, 91 U. S., 330-340; Moore vs. Robbins, 96 Ibid., 530.)"

The doctrine applicable to the conclusive character of the solemn judgments of courts, with full jurisdiction over the parties, and the subject-matter, made after appearance, pleading, and contest by parties on both sides, can not be properly applied to the proceedings of the land office, where no issue is taken, no adversary proceedings had, no contest made, and the land officers act only on such evidence as claimant presents, with no means of controverting its truth. (United States Minor, 114 United States, 243.)

The quasi judicial nature of the functions of land officers has reference only to cases in which individuals have, as against each other, contested the right to a patent before them. (Id.)

Where a patent has been obtained through mistake or by fraud and perjury, and there are no innocent holders for value, the legal title conveyed by the patent may be set aside in a court of equity. (Id.)

The principles settled by the courts are that the action of registers and receivers in admitting an entry of public lands is not conclusive, but is subject to review by the superior officers of the Land Department, by appeal in cases of contest between private parties, and as a matter of executive supervision in cases not of individual contest; that the latter are cases between the Government and the entry-man alone; that assignees before patent have no standing as innocent purchasers; that until patent issues on public-land entries the legal title to the land remains in the United States; that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may reject and cancel unpatented entries for illegality and fraud; that this is necessarily an act of executive jurisdiction; that the duties of supervising the disposal of public lands are executive duties and are not the subject of judicial interference; that the question of passing the title of the United States upon an entry of public lands under the public-land law is essentially a question of executive and not of judicial determination; that the point where the jurisdiction of the courts begins is the point at which executive jurisdiction ceases, namely, after patent has been issued, when, in a proper proceeding, the courts may intervene to correct the errors of executive action; and that it is only after the conveyance of legal title by patent that purchasers for value are protected by the courts.

The distinction between executive and judicial powers is elemental in our form of government, and this distinction has been invariably maintained by the highest judicial authorities. "It is impossible," say the Supreme Court, for the judiciary "to transfer a title that is yet in the United States."

Congress has exclusive power to dispose of the public lands. It may establish such agencies for that purpose as it pleases, but whether even Congress can constitutionally vest executive duties in the judicial courts may well be questioned. If this could be done it is apparent that the existing judicial establishment would be wholly inadequate to that purpose; that courts would need to be multiplied by the hundreds to take cognizance of the question, depending in tens of thousands of cases whether a pre-emptor has, by compliance with law, made himself a legal purchaser of public lands, or whether a homestead claimant has, by compliance with law, entitled himself to receive a patent for a given tract.

That the present system of ascertaining the validity of public-land entries is inefficient and unsatisfactory is undeniable. Registers and receivers can not and do not ascertain the validity of claims presented en masse and, as they usually are, upon alleged proofs made before numerous officers irresponsible to the United States. The means allowed the General Land Office are inadequate to the supervision contemplated by the law, which, if it could be fully exercised, might eliminate the false claims from the true ones.

But does the remedy lie in abolishing even the attempts of supervision, and in relieving claims from liability of inquiry by placing the most limited power of inquiry in tribunals which can not practically, if they could constitutionally, exercise any part of such power? It appears to me that this question answers itself.

The third section of the Senate bill amends instead of repeals the desert-land act and extends its provisions to the State of Colorado. The injury to the country in the illegal appropriation of great bodies of land under cover of this act, especially in valleys and along streams, thus monopolizing the control of still greater areas, is a sufficient warning against extending its provisions or perpetuating in any manner a measure that produces such results.

The seventh section provides a new form of entry, namely, that of "mountain homesteads." It is not the contemplation of the bill that there shall be any cultivation of the land. The purpose clearly is to relieve entrymen of the requirement of cultivation.

But the entry is still a homestead entry and the amendments proposed to the desert-land act made entries under that act homestead entries also. Thus every person can obtain three homestead entries, one under the homestead laws proper, one for 320 acres under the mountain act, and another for 320 acres also, under the desert act. And by making these latter two classes "homestead entries" they are brought under the provisions of the eighth section of the bill, which in effect validates and confirms them, however illegal, and although made upon land not subject to such entries unless the Government shall learn of the illegality within the impossible period of ninety days. In other words the "mountainous" and amended "desert" propositions of the bill open the whole country west of the one hundredth meridian to practically unrestrained appropriation through the merest forms of paper entry

The fifth section restricts regular homestead entries, that is to say, entries requiring residence, improvement, and cultivation, to 80 acres. These are entries which may be made by actual inhabitants and cultivators, who are thus discriminated against by the proposed bill. It is urged that such discrimination is proper because of the difference in the value of lands that may be taken for cultivation and those that may be taken for grazing purposes.

Clearly, indeed, the mountain and desert "homesteads" appear to be intended to supply forms of entry for grazing purposes. It is well known that the grazing interest is not an individual farming interest in the "desert" and "mountainous" regions, but a collective and corporate interest. It must be equally well known that the grazing entries provided for will necessarily be made in such collective and corporate interest since the control for stock-range purposes of the territory west of the one hundredth meridian largely prevents any entries from being made otherwise than in such interest.

The question, therefore, is whether this vast territory, nearly as large as the entire area of all the States of the Union east of the Mississippi River, and capable of sustaining a population of 50,000,000 of inhabitants, shall be given in fee to cattle companies.

It is urged, of course, that the land is worthless for any other than grazing purposes. If this were literally and universally true, it would be no good reason why the United States should hasten to place its title to half a continent in the hands of private corporations.

The inhabitants of China cultivate the entire surface of their vast territory, making the very rocks blossom with vegetation. The ancient Peruvians cultivated to the snow line of the Andes. Among the best lands in Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas are those that a few years ago were deemed worthless. It is unsafe to say that nature is forever barren anywhere. If the great area derided as worthless for agricultural purposes is worth seeking by corporations and syndicates, it is worth keeping by the Government; if worth purchasing by foreign capitalists, it is worth preserving for occupation by American citizens; if worth the price of fraud, bribery, perjury, and murder, by which its acquisition and control have in many cases hitherto been sought and maintained, it is worth holding onto by the Government until demanded by honest individual industry.

I think the United States need be in no hurry to part with these lands. It is, however, unquestionably competent for Congrsss to give away these lands if it pleases to do so. It is doubtless also competent for Congress, as a general proposition, to prohibit any inquiry into the validity of claims asserted to public lands; to abolish the conditions-precedent provided by existing laws for the acquisition of title; to repeal all restrictions calculated to preserve the public domain for actual settlement, and to require patents to be issued without regard to the merits of claims for them.

The propriety of doing these things is a matter which no doubt can be safely left with Congress to consider.

The need of some radical change in the public-land system is immediate and imperative. But it does not follow that such change should be in the direction of the condonation of frauds heretofore perpetrated, the opening wide the doors to irresponsible, unpunishable, and unlimited frauds in the future, the capitulation of law, order, and authority, the surrender of the Government of the United States to the robbers of its public lands; on the contrary it is my belief that the abnegation of national sovereignty over the public domain sought by various propositions now before Congress would be a present crime against homeless millions of the American people, and perilous to the future of the Republic.

It is a mere triteness of observation to say that the condition of a people, their peace and prosperity, and the security of their institutions depend primarily upon the tenure by which the soil of the country is held. No graver problem can be brought before the statesman of this period than that involved in the disposition of the remaining body of public lands. Shall they be preserved for actual inhabitancy, or shall they be given over to capitalistic ownership and control? If the former is the purpose of Congress, I respectfully submit that the practical solution of the difficulties of the existing situation is to place in the hands of the Land Department necessary means to extinguish unlawful and fraudulent claims, and to prevent the assertion of such claims in future by the prompt repeal of all laws under which claims of that character are now originated.

I respectfully recommend that H. R. 380 be substituted for Senate bill 1296, and that the third section of the House bill be so amended as to repeal sections 2299, 2301, and 2309 of the Revised Statutes, and section 2 of the act of June 15, 1880, entitled "An act relating to the public lands of the United States," that the fifth section of the bill be so amended as to exclude abandoned military or other reservations from public sale and private entry; that the sixth section be stricken out as practically unnecessary; and that the bill be further amended by provisos repealing the first and third sections of the act of May 14, 1880, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers on public lands," the act of June 14, 1878, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers on the public lands under the pre-emption laws," and the act of June 9, 1880, entitled "An act to amend sections 2262 and 2301 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the settler's affidavit in the pre-emption and commuted homestead cases."

I also especially recommend the repeal of the act of June 3, 1878, entitled "An act for the sale of timber lands in the States of California, Oregon, Nevada, and in Washington Territory."

It is further my judgment that the public interests and the interests of settlers on public lands would be promoted by the repeal of the act of June 3, 1878, entitled "An act authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes, and that the mineral laws should be amended by repealing all provisions authorizing the entry of placer mineral lands and mill-sites, which forms of entry are made a cover for an evasive appropriation of sources of water supply.

I also recommend that the making or procurement of false, fraudulent, or fictitious entries of public lands and the making or procurement of false and fraudulent surveys of public lands and of private land claims be declared penal offenses.

Very respectfully,

LIBBIE C. MONTIS.

The SPEAKER. On last Friday evening the House passed a bill (S. 1836) for the relief of Libbie C. Montis, with an amendment. It appears upon examination that the amendment sent to the Clerk's desk and agreed to by the House has no application to the bill. Since that time the amendment has been placed in the form in which it was intended to be adopted; and if there be no objection the vote passing the bill and the vote ordering it to be read a third time will be reconsidered, and the Clerk will now read the amendment as it was intended to go into the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Libbie C. Montis, widow of Mahlon D. Montis, late a private in Company G of the Second Regiment Ohio Volunteers, war with Mexico."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this amendment, the effect of which is simply to put the name of the beneficiary on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, will be agreed to, and the bill as amended will be read the third time, and passed. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

JAMES W. GOODRICH.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of House bill No. 5652 and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to James W. Goodrich, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $414.14, to indemnify him for loss of postal funds sustained by him and caused by the robbery of the post-office in Haverhill, Mass., in February, 1881.

The Committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out the words "fourteen dollars and fourteen cents" and insert "three dollars and ninety-seven cents;" so that it will read "the sum of $403.97."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEACH. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will give some reason why this claimant can not get his claim refunded under the general bill.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts. This bill is similar in character to one that I offered about two weeks ago, being the case of a burglary of a post-office, and the Postmaster-General made a report upon the case, declining to allow it upon the ground that there was no general law upon the subject. The report sets forth all the facts in this case, and if the gentleman desires it may be read.

Mr. BEACH. I will not object in this instance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES S. CLARK & CO.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2474) for the relief of James S. Clark & Co. and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read in full.

Mr. SPRINGER. Reserving my right to object, I would like to know how much is involved in this bill.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The amount is not specified in the bill, but is a matter to be adjudicated by the court.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the character of the claim?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. This is a case arising from a loss of cotton, which was taken under the "captured and abandoned property act." This cotton was sold and the proceeds turned into the Treasury of the United States under the act in question. The owner of the property, Mr. Clark, did not make his claim until two months after the six years' limitation within which parties who had cotton claims could file applications, and hence it was barred by the statute of limitation. The case was decided against him, therefore, for that reason and that only. The facts are shown to be, as I have stated, that the cotton was taken and the money put into the Treasury arising from the sale. All he asks now is that this bar of limitations be removed and that he go into court, and if he establishes the claim that the money be paid to him; otherwise, of course, he gets nothing.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the number of bales of cotton involved?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The claim is for nine hundred bales of cotton.

Mr. SPRINGER. That will amount to about $100,000.

I am obliged to object, Mr. Speaker, to the consideration of this until to-morrow, at all events, so that I can have an opportunity of investigating this report.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. If the chairman of the committee will allow me, I will say that the bill has already passed the Senate unanimously, and has been reported unanimously by the War Claims Committee of this House, and is now upon the Calendar. I hope, therefore, that he will not interpose an objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. It can be taken up in the same way in the morning; but I will have to object until I can examine the report more fully.

PENSIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the pensions appropriation bill with the recommendations of the committee on the amendments of the Senate thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the report be adopted; and also that a conference be appointed, as I have no doubt it will economize time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope these amendments will be read.

The amendments were read.

The motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. TOWNSHEND, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. LONG as managers at the conference on the part of the House.

JOHN M. HANSON VS. UNITED STATES.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back a resolution submitted to that committee and recommend its passage, with an amendment, striking out the words "Commissioner of the General Land Office," and inserting the "Secretary of the Interior."

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the resolution calling for information touching the amount necessary to execute a decree for survey in the case of John M. Hanson vs. the United States, in the United States court for the northern district of the State of Florida, having considered the same, recommend the adoption of the resolution, as follows:

HANSON VS. UNITED STATES.

Whereas in open court, on the 14th day of April, A. D. 1885, the honorable judge of the United States for the northern district of the State of Florida, in the cause entitled "John M. Hanson vs. The United States, decree for survey," did decree and order the surveyor-general for the State of Florida "to forthwith survey, make, and file in this cause a plat and map of such survey;" and

Whereas it appears that the surveyor-general aforesaid, not having money in his hands to execute the said order, referred it to the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office. The honorable Commissioner in a communication under date of July 14, 1885, to the surveyor-general decides "that the survey of the grant would have to be deferred until Congress made appropriation for the same:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the honorable Secretary of the Interior be requested at earliest day possible to furnish this House copies of the order of the honorable judge of the court aforesaid of April 14, 1885, and a copy of his instructions to the surveyor-general aforesaid of July 14, 1885, and an estimate of the amount of money required to survey said grant in accordance with the decree of the court, and such other information as may be necessary to the fulfillment of said order of the court aforesaid.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PATRICK S. DOIG.

Mr. LINDSLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1657) for the relief of Patrick S. Doig, and that the same be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Adjutant-General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion against Patrick S. Doig, late a private in Company D, Eighth Regiment United States Infantry, so that it may not be a hinderance to his right to a pension or bounty.

Mr. BEACH. I ask my colleague if this bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. LINDSLEY. It has been. There is a unanimous report in its favor.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LINDSLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN A. LONDON.

Mr. HALSELL. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 834), and that the same be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200 to John A. London, of Butler County, Kentucky, late a private in Company A, Twelfth Kentucky Regiment of Cavalry, on account of bounty due him under the laws of the United States.

The Committee on War Claims recommended the following amendments:

In line 5 strike out the words "the sum of two hundred dollars" and insert in lieu thereof "such sum of money."

At the end of the bill add the following:

"As he would have been entitled to under the laws of the United States had he been mustered into the United States service with Company A, Twelfth Kentucky Cavalry, on the 12th day of November, 1862."

Mr. SPRINGER. Do these amendments increase or diminish the amount?

Mr. HALSELL. They are simply intended to make the amount conform to the law as to bounty.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALSELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HERBERT and others called for the regular order.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw for a moment the call for the regular order that I may introduce a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The States and Territories will be called this morning for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I desire to offer this for the purpose of present consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. The regular order is demanded not only by the gentleman from Alabama but by other gentlemen. Is the demand insisted upon?

Mr. HERBERT. It is.

Whereas the said transfers are fraudulent upon their face, and if merely colorable the affidavit filed by the said Lancaster alleging his total insolvency was false, and the said settlement was procured by fraud, conspiracy, and perjury on the part of said Lancaster; and

Whereas in that case the said fraudulent settlement can and should be set aside, and the entire amount of said debt can and should be recovered to the use of the United States; and

Whereas the United States district attorney of the eastern district of Missouri has been lately investigating, under the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, the said frauds committed by said R. D. Lancaster upon the revenue of the United States; and

Whereas he discovered such evidence of fraud as justified him in demanding power to put the parties implicated under oath, and therefore applied to the Department for the detail of a clerk for that purpose, under section 183 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

"Any officer or clerk of any of the Departments lawfully detailed to investigate frauds on or attempts to defraud the Government, or any irregularity or misconduct of any officer or agent of the United States, shall have authority to administer an oath to any witness attending to testify or depose in the course of such investigation;" and

Whereas, for reasons which can only be surmised, this demand was refused:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a statement of what reasons, of a public nature, induced him to refuse, on the demand of the district attorney, the usual and necessary means provided by statute for the investigation of frauds upon the revenue laws, including the detail of a clerk requested by him; and also that the Secretary of the Treasury transmit to the House copies of all papers relating to the investigation in question, and the correspondence of the Department with the district attorney at Saint Louis; and

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills. My object is to reach the sundry civil bill.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to suspend that motion for a moment, in order that I may ask the House to consider at this time a resolution to prevent the destruction of Government property in the city of Memphis, for which the citizens of that town have subscribed the money themselves.

Mr. RANDALL. I will do that at the end of the session of to-day.

The question was taken on motion of Mr. RANDALL, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MATSON. I ask for a division.

The House divided; but before the completion of the count,

Mr. MATSON. I withdraw the demand for a division. My object was to see whether the other side of the House was really anxious for general pension legislation.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. REAGAN in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9478) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to occupy the hour to which I am entitled in the discussion of this bill. The bill and report speak for themselves, and, this being a business bill purely, I consider that the hour can be more usefully employed in the consideration of the details of it. I will therefore yield now to any gentleman who may desire to discuss the bill under the hour rule; and if no gentleman desires to avail himself of that opportunity, I will ask unanimous consent to dispense with general debate, with the condition, however, that when we reach that part of the bill which relates to the surveys of the public lands and the prevention of frauds in connection therewith general debate shall be allowed for a reasonable time. I think I have come to an understanding with the gentlemen who desire to speak on that portion of the bill which will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is all right.

Mr. RANDALL. I also ask that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who is a member of the commission in relation to the scientific bureaus, shall have an opportunity to speak in that connection.

Mr. LONG. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to also reserve for me forty minutes which I have promised to gentlemen who wish to speak.

Mr. RANDALL. On what part of the bill?

Mr. LONG. I do not know what part. I have promised the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN], who is not in his seat at this moment, twenty minutes, and I have promised the same time to the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW].

Mr. RANDALL. My wish is not in the least to restrict debate, but it is essential that this bill shall be passed at an early day, and I think I shall have the co-operation of every member of the House in securing that object.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is it the understanding that when a portion of the bill is reached in which there is a general interest and which gentlemen may desire to discuss briefly an opportunity will be afforded them to do so?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What is the understanding as to the part of the bill relating to the Geological and Geodetic Survey?

Mr. RANDALL. I put no restriction upon the debate on that part of the bill, because the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], having been a member of the commission, desires to speak upon the subject, and other gentlemen may wish to reply to him.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I shall want to occupy a little time on that question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is the limit proposed on the general debate?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations may have misunderstood me as assenting to general debate upon all parts of the bill.

Mr. RYAN. The gentleman from Ohio is not in his seat just now, but I think his understanding was that general debate would be only upon the portion of the bill in regard to the survey of the public lands.

Mr. RANDALL. There will be no difficulty about it, because members on this side of the House have no desire to cut off any reasonable debate.

Mr. RYAN. I do not think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] misunderstood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. I was afraid he might have led me into too large an agreement—one that I might not be able to carry out.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania please indicate his precise request?

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon this bill be dispensed with, subject to the conditions which I have stated.

A MEMBER. What are they?

Mr. RANDALL. That when the provision relating to the survey of the public lands is reached general debate shall be allowed, and again when the provision relating to the Geological and Geodetic Surveys is reached. Also that forty minutes be reserved, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] states he has agreed to give to certain members.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the Chair state the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that by unanimous consent general debate be dispensed with until the Committee of the Whole shall reach the clauses in relation to the survey of the public lands and appropriations therefor, and the clauses in reference to the Geological Survey, &c., and that in addition there be a reservation of forty minutes in favor of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG].

Mr. DUNHAM. Would a motion be in order to suspend the rules and pass the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. We are not in the House, and the motion suggested by the gentleman is of course not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]? The Chair hears none.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment, read the following:

For court-house and post-office at Louisville, Ky.: For continuation of building, $200,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to inquire whether these appropriations for public buildings are restricted to the amount limited in the laws providing for the construction of the buildings or whether appropriations have been made without regard to that limitation.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no instance, so far as I know—if there is any such instance it is an oversight on the part of the committee—where these appropriations exceed the limits authorized by existing law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is the information I desired to elicit.

The Clerk read as follows:

For post-office and court-house at Quincy, Ill.: For approaches complete, exclusive of iron fence, $5,000.

Mr. BAKER. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

For post-office, custom-house, and court-house at Rochester, N. Y.: For continuing the work on and construction of the building, $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a brief explanatory statement. The act which passed the House at this session and became a law on the 3d of May last increased the limit of expense for this building at Rochester from $300,000 to $500,000—an increase of $200,000, which was made in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect. In a communication which has been printed as Executive Document No. 236, the Supervising Architect asked an appropriation of $100,000 for the continuance of this work. There is available to the credit of this fund for the continuation of the work under existing contracts about $108,000.

When I observed that the appropriation for this building had been omitted from the present bill, I at first suspected it was an oversight, but I afterward learned from my friend the chairman of the committee that inasmuch as $108,000 was available, the committee thought an appropriation at this time would not be necessary. But I am assured by the contractors and by the Supervising Architect that an appropriation in addition to the amount now available is absolutely required; and I desire to urge it upon the committee, for the reason that there is a very great necessity for the completion of this building in Rochester at the earliest possible date. It is designed to accommodate the post-office, the district court, the internal-revenue officers, the custom-house officers, and the commissioners of the United States. The various offices connected with these branches of public business are now accommodated in rented quarters. The post-office is in a wooden building, the accommodations of which are wholly insufficient; and there is urgent necessity for the earliest possible completion of the building now in progress. The appropriation proposed in my amendment will, in the judgment of the officers of the Government, be necessary to continue the work. It is within the limit prescribed by law; and I trust the chairman of the committee will consent to the proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. The reason which prompted the action of the committee in omitting any appropriation for the building at Rochester was that this building had already received appropriations to the amount of $300,000, being at that time up to the limit of the law. Since the consideration of that part of the bill by the Committee on Appropriations a bill has been passed by both Houses and has become a law increasing the limit to $500,000; but the report of the Supervising Architect shows that there was in the Treasury on September 30, 1885, an unexpended balance of about $183,000 for the work upon this building. The committee, even in view of the legislation to which I have just referred, would not, I think, have reported an additional appropriation for this purpose. The gentleman from Rochester [Mr. BAKER] now tells the committee that there is the sum of $108,000 not covered by contracts.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER. I understand that existing contracts cover the amount now available toward construction, and that contemplated changes in the building connected with its enlargement, which is provided for by this last legislation, will necessitate the appropriation of this additional amount in order that the work may be prosecuted during the coming fiscal year.

Mr. RANDALL. If, as the gentleman states, contracts are made covering the amount already appropriated, the chances are that those contracts embrace about as much work as can be done during the coming fiscal year.

Now the gentleman asks, in addition to that, $100,000. I could not consent, so far as that is concerned, to such an enormous increase at this time. If it were more reasonable I do not know, as one member of the committee, in view of the extension which has become a law, I would interpose with so much vehemence.

Mr. BAKER. A single word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I do not wish to increase the amount of this appropriation bill one dollar unnecessarily. Now, these changes will necessitate new contracts. The chairman of the committee, of course, should know better than I do about these matters.

Mr. RANDALL. It has not been entered upon, and no plan has been submitted to the committee in connection with the increase in this structure.

Mr. BAKER. In that connection I will say the new plans for the large building are made, and the working plans are being perfected for resuming operations. Of course I am depending on the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, who says he will need this amount, and has certified that in the letter which is before the committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I would like to know whether this change in the limit has been made heretofore?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; that is law, making the limit $500,000. It recently became the law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is it proposed to exceed that amount?

Mr. RANDALL. No; this is within $100,000 of that limit. I would like to have the gentleman modify his amendment and make it $50,000.

Mr. BAKER. I will compromise and make it $75,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish any compromise.

Mr. BAKER. I only want what is necessary to resume operations upon this structure, and I think $100,000 is necessary.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is the question?

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will make it $50,000 I will agree to that. I understand the gentleman accepts that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER. No.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I ask for a vote on my amendment making it $100,000.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 46.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For court-house and post-office at Winona, Minn.: For completion of building under present limit, $80,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 136, the following:

"For court-house and post-office at Concord, N. H.: For fire-proofing and interior finish of same, $35,000."

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order on that amendment there is no law for it. There is an estimate for it, but there is no law.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no disposition to discuss it at length. I will say, Mr. Chairman, simply this contemplates an appropriation included in a bill which has already passed the Senate. I admit it exceeds the limit, and if the point of order is made it is good against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Northwest Seal Rock light station, California: For continuing the construction of a light-house on Northwest Seal Rock, off Point Saint George, California, $50,000: Provided, That the entire cost of this light-house shall not exceed $450,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether a single limit of law is anywhere exceeded in these paragraphs relative to light-houses and light stations?

Mr. RANDALL. There is no limitation. The committee inserted some limitations where there was no limit to the law authorizing them. The report shows that. There are some appropriations for light-houses which were inserted without law. Lubec Narrows light station, Maine, and Watch Point light station, Lake Champlain, New York, are subject to the point of order if it shall be made against them, for there is no law providing for these expenditures; and if the point of order should be made, of course they will have to be ruled out. I wish to act with the committee in perfect good faith. The appropriation for Lubec Narrows is $40,000, and for Watch Point, $500. And those appropriations are not in obedience to existing law. As I have said, they are, in my judgment, subject to the point of order.

Mr. LONG. But that is not admitted on the part of the committee, which holds they are works in progress of construction.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Massachusetts is quite right in correcting me. As he says, that is not the opinion of the majority of the committee, otherwise these appropriations would not be here. I desire to say to the House in my own judgment as an individual member of the committee they ought not to be here; but nevertheless they are here. It will be noticed the limitations in this particular will be found in the report of the committee.

There being no limitation as to Musquito Inlet, we ask to insert the entire cost shall not exceed the limited estimate of $200,000. And as to the Northwest Seal Rock, that the entire cost of the light-house shall not exceed $450,000. That is the limitation.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I am not interested in this appropriation, and only made the point of order for the purpose of emphasizing my opposition to any legislation in the bill. I now withdraw it.

Mr. RANDALL. I also desire to state that there was inserted in the bill a steam-tender for the fourth light-house district. The present tender there is so old as to have become dangerous to navigate it; and as it belonged to the general light-house system, the provision was inserted in the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order upon the paragraph withdrawn by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RANDALL. You refer now to the Lubec light? I do not clearly understand the paragraph to which the gentleman from Ohio made the point of order.

Mr. RYAN. It has been withdrawn.

Mr. McMILLIN. And I rise to renew it. I also desire to reserve the point of order as to the New Bedford light.

Mr. LONG. That has not been reached.

Mr. McMILLIN. When it is reached.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I believe we ought to have a distinct understanding as to what the point of order is. I am inclined to think the original point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio was good, as I understand the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But the gentleman as chairman of the committee has treated the House very fairly. Nothing that he has done will tend to confuse our discussion of the point of order. It was well enough to have had the explanation, and I think the gentleman from Ohio did entirely right to withdraw it. I submit, therefore, to the gentleman from Tennessee, if he has no substantial objection to this particular item, that he also withdraw the point of order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point of order for this purpose, and I can not, for the reasons I am going to give, withdraw it. We have changed the rules of the House, whether wisely or otherwise I am not going to argue, to prevent legislation on appropriation bills; and after that change, which has been enforced liberally where it increased expenditures, I do not propose that we shall be placed in the awkward attitude of refusing to enforce the rule where there is a diminution of expenditures. In other words, where the enforcement of the rule would increase expenditures it has been liberally construed, and I repeat, I do not propose that we shall embarrass ourselves by refusing to enforce it where there is a diminution, or where its non-enforcement will be an increase of expenditures.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I submit that where an amendment or a provision in the bill meets with almost the unanimous consent of the House we may well waive a point of order which would be good if insisted upon. But I will content myself with suggesting to the Chair that the point of order probably came too late. I made a point of order the other day on the naval bill which was ruled out on the ground that discussion had taken place on the merits, and that the point of order came too late.

Mr. McMILLIN. In response to what my friend from Illinois has said I wish to state that I agree with him as to the propriety of the rule and what its construction should be in such cases. I do not believe in the doctrine that the House should ever hamper itself with any provision which prevents it from controlling the appropriations it is making. I believe it is right to designate how the appropriations shall be made and expended, and that the limitation ought to go with every appropriation bill. I do not believe that there ought to be any rule of the House ever adopted that will contravene that principle.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. McMILLIN. But having entered upon it, having enforced it whenever the result was an increase of expenses, I submit that it should also be enforced where the result is a retrenchment of expenditures. Let us be consistent in the enforcement of the rule that we have made.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentlemen from Tennessee will observe that the committee are fixing a limit beyond which the Light-House Board could not go in the construction of a light on this rock. Now, $450,000 we thought was a proper limitation on the aggregate amount to be expended on this rock for light-house purposes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What does the law provide?

Mr. RANDALL. The law makes no limitation, and there may be, as the committee thought, a very large amount in excess of $450,000 expended there unless there was some restriction. We believe that limitation is sufficient to complete in every respect a proper light-house at that point. I hope the gentleman under such circumstances as these will permit this by consent to remain in the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not make the point of order on the proviso if the appropriation is to be made. But my point of order is that there is no law authorizing the construction.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. McMILLIN. I so understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself. It was on that ground that I submitted the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. We are talking altogether of different paragraphs of the bill. I am talking of the paragraph with which we are now dealing, that with reference to the Northwest Seal Rock, in California, where the proviso is made that the entire cost shall not exceed $450,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not wish to make the point of order as against the limitation of any appropriation which the bill legitimately carries.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn, the Clerk will read.

Mr. CANNON. Permit me a moment, Mr. Chairman. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee is ready to invoke the rule where any thing does not please him in relation to legislation, but when it does please him he is ready to waive it.

Mr. McMILLIN. How is that?

Mr. CANNON. I say I understand the gentleman's position to be that where the legislation does not please him he is willing to invoke the aid of the rule, but where it does please him he does not desire to interpose the point of order.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman has listened to little purpose if he so understood me.

Mr. CANNON. I wanted to see if I was correct.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir. The gentleman was not at all correct.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question before the committee.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Lubec Narrows light station, Maine: For establishing a light to guide through the dredged channel in Lubec Narrows, Maine, $40,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is the paragraph to which I made the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall only say that the bill establishing that light has passed both Houses, but has not yet become a law. The paragraph is no doubt subject to the point of order.

Mr. RYAN. I do not believe it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a new light.

Mr. RYAN. I know it is a new light. But I think the general duty of lighting the coast which devolves on the Government authorizes the establishing of light-houses wherever they are needed for the purposes of commerce, and authorizes Congress to pass a law to establish a light-house wherever along the coast commerce may require it. And I believe it is incident to our right to maintain and protect the commerce of the coast that we shall make the necessary appropriations.

Mr. CLARDY. The point suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] was fully discussed some time ago. I think we all agree in the ruling by the Speaker that the establishment of each light-house requires new legislation.

Now, this particular bill, as has been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, passed the House and in some form has passed the Senate, but it is now in conference and it may or may not become a law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does that include this light?

Mr. CLARDY. Yes, sir; I think the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] ought to be sustained. I want to say in that connection I make this statement because there are other bills which were passed on the same day by the House that this bill was passed, and which have also been passed by the Senate, which are not embraced in this appropriation bill. They are bills equally meritorious, and I deem it unjust and unfair to them that these bills should be inserted here and that the others should be omitted. I trust the point of order will be sustained.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say a word about the point of order, which I think is a very important point. I believe under the Constitution, Congress having the power to regulate commerce not only as regards foreign nations but among the States wherever you find navigable waters upon which commerce goes, the erecting of light-houses, the doing anything you deem proper that will promote that commerce is a matter that calls for an appropriation; and the Constitution as well as our general legislation casts the duty upon Congress to appropriate money for those objects. I understand gentlemen to take the position that before a light can be placed at this or any other point along our coasts, or along our great rivers upon which commerce goes, and which are declared to be navigable, Congress must pass an act declaring that a light-house shall be constructed at a particular point. I can not agree with any such interpretation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is no doubt about the power of Congress to appropriate money for a light-house at this point, but that is not the question. This House has provided by its rules it will not make appropriations on appropriation bills for anything not previously in another way provided for by law. Now, this very point is included in the bill which has passed this House and is in conference. It is not a law.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, I will say the highest law known to the country does authorize this or any other improvement that is necessary to protect our commerce in the way of light-houses.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The Constitution authorizes it, of course, but we must do it in the way that our rules prescribe.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. LONG. Will the Chair before he rules on the point of order allow me just one word? So far as this appropriation is concerned the rules to-day are exactly what they have been in previous Congresses. This provision would have been as obnoxious to the rule in the last Congress as it is to the present rule, and yet in previous Congresses it has always been held that these light-houses might be established on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to state that this provision for a light-house at Lubec Narrows was an estimate which came to the House on the recommendation of the Light-House Board. It is a bill not inaugurated by any local or individual influence or interest whatever; but it was regularly recommended by the Light-House Board, in order to provide for the necessities of commerce resulting from the opening of a new channel at Lubec Narrows.

Congress for several years has appropriated year after year for opening a channel at Lubec Narrows, which it is impossible to utilize without the establishment of this light-house, that is to say, impossible to utilize at night. And the Light-House Board recommended the establishment of this light-house, a bill for which has passed this House, and which I supposed had passed the Senate, as there was no objection to it. But I am informed now it is hung up in conference upon an omnibus bill, in which the Senate has included a number of light-house bills that have passed this House.

Now, it is obvious, Mr. Chairman, that this is a measure which the Congress of the United States will eventually adopt. There is no objection raised to it on the merits. The necessity of it for the uses of commerce has been brought to the attention of the House by the Light-House Board, and I do trust that the point of order will not be permitted to throw this appropriation out of the bill at this time, and thus possibly prevent for another year the erection of a building which is absolutely necessary for the uses of commerce, and against which no one on either side of the House has the least objection.

The CHAIRMAN. This item of appropriation not being for work already in progress, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say that I differ with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] as to the rule. I think the rule now is not the same as it was before as to this particular matter.

Mr. LONG. What do I understand is ruled out on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The items in lines 171 down to 173.

The Clerk read as follows:

Watch Point light station, Lake Champlain, New York: For the re-establishment of a light on Watch Point, Lake Champlain, New York, $500.

Steam-tender for the fourth light-house district: For building and completing a new steam-tender for service in the fourth light-house district, $68,300.

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point of order on the provision for a steam-tender.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order upon the preceding provision in regard to the Watch Point light station.

Mr. LONG. Too late.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Missouri addressed the Chair while the Clerk was passing to the next paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not desire to take advantage of anybody here.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] to make the point of order on this provision in regard to the Watch Point light station?

Mr. CLARDY. I undertook to make the point, because this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. If that fact is not controverted the point of order will be sustained. [After a pause.] The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to know what paragraph this point is made on.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on this steam-tender appropriation. It may be a very proper appropriation, but there is no law authorizing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to be heard on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. RANDALL. The general law authorizes the light-house establishment and the purchase of fuel and the pay of employés connected with the service. It allows for the purchase of provisions and various other things, and vessels of this kind are essential to the execution of the law in connection with the light-house service. Therefore this is different from other matters that have been objected to and which require specific law. This is essential to the administration of the service under existing law.

I desire that the House shall have the benefit of all the information the committee has on these subjects, and, therefore, I read this statement:

This is to take the place of the Geranium, a wooden side-wheel steamer. There were long periods during last winter when it was impossible to replace important buoys because of the peculiar construction of this tender. She can be removed to some district where such arduous service is not required.

That is all I have to say on this point.

Mr. McMILLIN. In response to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I would state that there is no law authorizing the supplanting of the "Geranium." The present law contemplates that the fragrance of that flower shall continue with us, and statutory action is required to "waste its sweetness on the desert air." [Laughter.] Another steamer is said to be necessary. Now, it will not be contended that there is a law authorizing the construction of that steamer, and the gentleman's argument that the steamer is necessary for the light-house service would be equally forcible upon the point of order made against the light-house itself, because if the steamer is necessary the light-house itself is necessary, and so we would have no limitation. What I want, Mr. Chairman, is a clean-cut bill, and I insist that, there being no law for the construction of this vessel, we should not enact a law on an appropriation bill. This matter also, I understand, is in conference. This House has practically declared that there is no law authorizing it by attempting to enact a law, and the question is in conference to-day. Either the House did not know what it was about then, or else there is no law authorizing the construction of this steamer. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask a decision.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I insist that this particular paragraph is not properly open the point of order. My proposition is this: that the rule is not intended to prevent legislation which has a direct relation to the subject-matter in hand; but it is intended to prevent and prohibit legislation which relates to new matter. That is the general proposition.

But further than that, I submit that, the Government having established a Light-House Board and undertaken to provide a proper system of light-houses, a provision in an appropriation bill which, in the judgment of the committee, proposes simply to establish a new light-house or to provide the Light-House Board with a new tender or steamboat is merely legislation in the direction of a system to which the Government is already committed, and is therefore in no proper sense new legislation. The Government is engaged in this work, is committed to it, has established a Light-House Board; and hence in making appropriations of this kind we are doing substantially the same thing as when we appropriate money for the continuation of a public work already in progress. The latter proposition, though distinct and positive in its character, involves the same principle as the provision now under consideration, which it seems to me should be dealt with in the same way. Otherwise it appears to me that the Committee on Appropriations will find themselves met by difficulties which will so completely obstruct and hamper them in the discharge of their duties that it will be impossible to appropriate money successfully to enable the Government to go on with the prosecution of business in which it is engaged.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, on reading the statute which relates to lights and buoys I find that among the appurtenances and appointments which are recognized as necessary for the establishment of these light-houses are light-vessels, beacon-buoys, &c. In other words, a tender, or light-vessel, seems to be recognized with buoys, fuel, coal, &c., as part of the machinery contemplated by the general law. Hence I submit the present provision is not new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Under clause 3 of Rule XXI no appropriation for any expenditures not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works as are already in progress, can be made. Under that clause of the rule the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I did not understand distinctly the ruling of the Chair. Did the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the Chair, I desire, before we pass further, to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] whether he does not think an appeal ought to be taken from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not mean to appeal.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will appeal, Mr. Chairman; and I wish to say a word on this appeal.

There is upon the statute-book a law constituting a Light-House Board; there is a law constituting the fourth light-house district; there is a law providing for buoys, seamen, vessels, and all the appliances for this service. The Book of Estimates contains, in a note, the statement that this appropriation is for a steamer—

To take the place of the Geranium, a wooden side-wheel steamer. There were long periods during last winter when it was impossible to replace important buoys because of the peculiar construction of this tender. She can be removed to some district where such arduous service is not required.

So that here is a harbor upon which are buoys, adjacent to which are light-houses; and a small steamer is necessary to replace the buoys and protect under general law this harbor. The proposition now is to appropriate for that small steamer. I understand the point of order to be that this appropriation can not be made unless, in the first place, there is passed a separate, independent law authorizing this steamer to be provided. If this is to be the construction of the rule, where are we to stop? If that is what the rule means, if that is what the decision of the point of order means, can we under such a construction buy a skiff, can we buy anything, unless there is a prior special law authorizing the expenditure? In my opinion the House of Representatives, in adopting the rule now invoked, never intended to place such a limitation upon the power of the House in making appropriations. The replacing of buoys is a matter incident to the maintenance of the light-house service; and for that purpose this small steamer is required. This is a necessary incident to the execution of existing law under the Constitution. The buying of fuel, the buying of skiffs, the construction of steamers of wood or iron, necessary to carry on this business, is a mere matter of appropriation for a work in being, a work in progress; and I believe that under the rules of the House we have authority to make such an appropriation on a general appropriation bill—not as a matter of new law, but in carrying out the Constitution under existing law, the Constitution being known to all the people, and the existing law declaring these harbors to be harbors, constituting the Light-House Board, and authorizing the conduct of the business of that board.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, I submit there is another consideration upon which this provision is in order. I understand the point made by the gentleman from Tennessee to be that this is new legislation; that it is similar to the establishment of a new light-house. But, sir, this is not a new object in any sense. There is already in use in connection with this light-house district a wooden side-wheel steamer called the Geranium. That is part of the work already in progress there. It is an object already under way. The old steamer is to a certain extent worn out, is no longer fit for the use required. There is no proposition here to establish a new service, calling for the employment of a new tender, but simply to carry out the work already in progress, in accordance with the language of the rule itself, the purpose being to make good a part of that work which is deteriorated or in need of repair.

The decision of this matter turns of course upon the question whether we shall adopt a narrow construction, which will tend to defeat all action by this House in matters of this kind, or whether we shall adopt a liberal and reasonable construction. A narrow construction, if the House sees fit to adopt it, can no doubt be defended. But I trust we shall adopt a generous, liberal, reasonable construction, which will enable us to carry out the real spirit of the rule, so that where a work or object is already in progress, and a part of the appurtenances or machinery of that work is in need of repair, we can carry the work forward even if it requires the substitution of a new tender for an old tender, a new sail for an old sail, a new boat for an old boat, or a new gallon of oil for an old gallon which has been consumed.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CLARDY. According to the theory of the gentleman from Massachusetts because there had been light-houses at a few harbors the Committee on Appropriations would have complete jurisdiction to have gone on and made new appropriations therefor.

Mr. LONG. I hold so and held so in the committee.

Mr. CLARDY. But the committee did not vote so.

Mr. LONG. No, it did not.

Mr. McMILLIN. The committee held otherwise, that the old light-house could not be supplanted by a new one, and properly referred the subject to the Committee on Commerce. The gentleman from Massachusetts concedes his case away.

The question is on the appeal from the ruling of the Chair. The question is whether the ruling is right or wrong.

The gentleman from Massachusetts[Mr. LONG] says the question is so close either ruling might be sustained. Are we to vote the Chair has made a wrong ruling? I wish to ask again, if there were authority for the construction of this vessel, why is it this House has solemnly passed a statute authorizing the construction of this very vessel?

Mr. LONG. The question was not raised.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, sir, the fact was there was no law to authorize it. The rule provides where there is no law there shall be no appropriation, and the question we are to act upon is whether the Chair shall be overruled when he decides there is no law for it. Where is the law for the construction of this vessel? Who has seen it? Who has heard of it? Who has read it to this House?

If what the gentleman said as to the light-house service is applicable, then on the appropriation bill you may tear down every light-house in America, sink every vessel and build new ones in their places, and not only new ones, but ten where is now one. That is the legitimate outcome of the position he has taken.

He says either ruling may be sustained here. If you follow strict construction, then the Chair is right. Now, will the House vote to overrule the Chair, who has ruled out this provision, when we all know it is a ruling in strict accordance with the rule? If we do so we will do injustice to the Chair. We will also violate the rules of the House which we have so recently adopted. We will do the country still greater injustice.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustained the point of order, and from that point of order an appeal has been taken to the committee. The question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Seul Choix Point light station, Michigan: For establishing a light on Seul Choix Point, Michigan, $15,000.

Mr. CLARDY. I make the point of order. Is there a law for that?

Mr. RANDALL. There is a law for that.

Mr. CLARDY. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Store-house, Revenue-Marine Service, Wood's Holl, Mass.: For extension of wharf and erection of abuilding to be used as a ware-house and coal store-house for revenue-marine service, at Wood's Holl, Mass., $12,000.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 266, add:

"For a suitable steam-vessel, to be used in patrolling the Mississippi River between New Orleans and the Passes with the view to prevent smuggling, $10,000."

Mr. RANDALL. I will reserve the point of order on that amendment, but I am willing to hear what the gentleman has to say on the subject.

Mr. BLANCHARD. As showing the necessity for this appropriation for the construction of a suitable vessel or tug to be used between the custom-house at New Orleans and the mouth of the Mississippi I send to the Clerk's desk to be read some communications from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 12, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 2 last, and its inclosure, a communication from the surveyor of customs at New Orleans, requesting that a steam-tug be furnished for duty in that district, and suggesting that an estimate for this purpose be submitted to Congress.

In reply, I inclose herewith a copy of Department letter of the 10th instant, addressed to Hon. J. B. EUSTIS, United States Senate, in which it is recommended that the sum of $10,000 be appropriated for the construction or purchase, as the Department may deem advisable, of a suitable steam-vessel, to be used in patrolling the Mississippi River between New Orleans and the passes with the view to prevent smuggling.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

Hon. N. C. BLANCHARD,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., May 10, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant and its inclosure, a communication from the surveyor of customs at New Orleans, requesting that a steam-tug be furnished for duty in that district, and desiring to be informed if the Department has any recommendation to offer in relation to an appropriation for the purpose.

In reply you are informed that after an examination of the recommendations from the customs officers at New Orleans on file in this Department, it is believed that it would be advantageous if Congress would appropriate the sum of $10,000 for the construction or purchase, as the Department may deem advisable, of a suitable steam vessel, to be used in patrolling the Mississippi River between New Orleans and the Passes with the view to prevent smuggling.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

Hon. J. B. EUSTIS,
United States Senate.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The collector of customs and the surveyor of the port of New Orleans have earnestly recommended to the Secretary of the Treasury that a steam-tug should be provided for the customs service at that point, and in accordance with these recommendations the Secretary of the Treasury has advised Congress to make an appropriation of $10,000 for that purpose.

A steam vessel is required by the exigencies of the customs service at that port. In the value of exports and imports New Orleans is second only to New York, and yet not a steam vessel is provided for the use of the customs service there. New Orleans is about 125 miles from the mouth of the river, and it is very essential to have a steam vessel to ply between the port and the mouth of the river. I think it will be a judicious expenditure and one in the line of economy.

It is well known that much smuggling is going on, and unless the customs service is given this steam vessel to prevent it, it results in a loss of thousands of dollars annually to the Government in the way of revenue. Now is it not economy to stop that by allowing this vessel to be built?

Mr. RANDALL. I am not prepared to gainsay a word the gentleman has uttered in favor of this proposition. But we had no estimate for it, and of course it is not in this bill; and under the decision of the chairman a moment ago, and which was sustained by the House, it is clearly subject to the point of order. If the gentleman, however, can by hook or crook or some other way, or somewhere else, secure the insertion of the amendment, I am not opposed to it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the point of order will not be insisted upon.

Mr. RANDALL. I have to do so. I can not discriminate. The gentleman will see the delicacy of my situation.

Mr. BLANCHARD. What is the point of order?

Mr. RANDALL. It is the same as that made against the steam-tender for the fourth light-house district; that is to say, there is no law providing for it. I sympathize with the gentleman, but I am unable to help him in this matter.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not want the gentleman's sympathy, I want his vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. You want the point of order withdrawn. I can not do that. This is not contained in the estimates.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I wish to ask if the gentleman seriously believes that it is necessary to have an act of Congress to authorize the construction of a vessel like this before the Committee on Appropriations can make provision for it?

Mr. RANDALL. I say now that that is the recent decision of the Chair, which was sustained by the committee.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I caught exactly the point of order on which the Chair ruled a little while ago.

Mr. CANNON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. My eye was turned in that direction while the appeal from the decision of the Chair was pending just now, and I do not remember having seen the gentleman give me any substantial aid or comfort. [Laughter.] Now, I am sorry for the position he is in, but do not see how I can help him.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is that a question, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois, or a mere gratuitous statement? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Then I will withdraw it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Well, on the point of order, it occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a case in which the point should be sustained. Under existing law it is required that Congress shall make appropriations for the customs service at the port of New Orleans. Whatever is necessary for that service it is the duty of Congress to provide. Now, it is clearly shown here by the report of the customs officers at the port of New Orleans, and by the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, that this steam vessel is needed there. It is an incident, I may say, to the customs service there—an indispensable requisite. It is as much almost of necessity to the customs service as is an appropriation for repairs upon the custom-house itself; and it seems to me, sir, to be stretching the rule to sustain a point of order upon a proposition of this kind that the appropriation can not be allowed here because no special act of Congress has been passed authorizing the construction of this steam vessel.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order under clause 3 of Rule XXI.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 266, insert "for the construction of one revenue steamer for duty on the Southern coast of the United States, $85,000."

Mr. RANDALL. I must make the point of order against that amendment, but will reserve it to allow the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, in support of the amendment I might content myself, in view of the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations makes the point of order against it, with reading the recommendations or suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the amendment, which will be found in the Book of Estimates, on page 197. After making an estimate for this vessel, he says, in a note appended:

The Revenue-Marine steamer McLane, which it is desired to replace, was of light build originally, and not designed for the service; is now worn out and deemed unworthy of repairs. The Department has no vessel with which to supply her place. The station can not be left vacant without great public detriment. Due regard for the public interest and true economy require that the appropriation be made.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, in view of this statement of facts, coming as it does from the Secretary of the Treasury himself, who controls the Revenue-Marine Service of this country, that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations might waive this point of order, which I understand is raised merely in the interest of economy. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that it would be much more economical to allow the appropriation to be made in order that there should be a seaworthy vessel upon the Southern coast for the purpose indicated than to attempt to repair the McLane.

That vessel is in such a condition that when a storm arises in the Gulf of Mexico it is dangerous for her to put to sea, because she would be in the condition of the Tallapoosa and other vessels of the American Navy, unfit to weather the storm, and, instead of being able to rescue those who might be subjected to the dangers of the deep, she would herself be in peril. The officer in command in fact has reported that the McLane was not seaworthy and was in no condition to perform the duties required of a revenue-cutter.

Is it right, then, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to leave a large portion of the Southern coast without a cutter? This vessel performs duty on our coast from Port Eads, in Louisiana, down to Brownsville, at the mouth of the Rio Grande. The Secretary of the Treasury tell us in this Book of Estimates that she is totally unfit for the service and is in such a condition that she is unworthy of repair.

Which, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is the more economical method of procedure, to allow this amendment to go through without raising the point of order, thereby perhaps being subjected to the odium of inconsistency, or to have so large an extent of the Southern coast left without the service of a revenue-cutter at all? There is more danger of smuggling along that coast than there is along the Atlantic coast, which is amply protected by well-equipped and seaworthy vessels that are suitable for the service to which they are assigned. From Cuba, from Mexico, from South America smugglers can come and land with impunity upon the Southern coast unless we have revenue-cutters to protect it, particularly as in the land customs service we have not guards enough along the coast to prevent these smugglers from landing or to capture them after they shall have landed.

I again say that true economy would seem to demand the waiver of the point of order in this case at least, and the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the odium which might come from an inconsistent action on my part that compels me to make the point of order. I commend to the gentleman from Texas my remarks in reply to the gentleman from Louisiana. I can not withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CRAIN. May I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations one question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. CRAIN. Is there not an exception to every rule?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; that is an axiom.

Mr. CRAIN. Will you make an exception in this case?

Mr. RANDALL. I am act ng for the Committee on Appropriations and not in my own individual right here.

Mr. CRAIN. I understand that.

Mr. RANDALL. While I have no doubt there is force in what the gentleman from Texas states, still I must keep straight on the line which has been drawn, that nothing shall go into this bill which is subject to the point of order.

Mr. LONG. I rise to a question of order. I understand there is nothing before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is sustained.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Engraving and printing:
For labor and expenses of engraving and printing, 1887: For salaries of all necessary clerks and employés, and for labor (by the day, piece, or contract), including labor of workmen skilled in engraving, transferring, and other specialties necessary for carrying on the work of engraving notes, bonds, and other securities or obligations of the United States, and national-bank notes, the pay for such labor to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at rates not exceeding the rates usually paid for such work, $300,860, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question about this innocent-looking paragraph. I see that it appropriates the money in bulk for clerks, laborers, workmen, &c. I would like the gentleman to state whether or not this section does not drop some twenty-five clerks from the control of the civil-service law by putting them underneath the operations of that law?

Mr. RANDALL. I will be quite frank with the gentleman. This appropriation is in bulk, with a limitation only on the number of employés. The head of that bureau did recommend a provision to be inserted by which twenty-five employés would be brought under the civil-service law.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Below the civil-service law?

Mr. RANDALL. Brought under the operation of the civil-service law. They are not now by existing law under that law; and the committee, or the majority of the committee, did not wish to take them out of the classification that they are under by past law and transfer them within the operation of the civil-service law. I think I have been straight and frank in my reply.

Mr. DINGLEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 273 by inserting, after the word "notes," the following: "of the denomination of $1, $2, and other denominations authorized by law."

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no point of order applicable. These are the denominations already authorized by law.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to hear what the point of order is.

Mr. RANDALL. The law gives the discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury in this matter of the printing of one and two dollar notes, and this takes from the Secretary of the Treasury that discretion. The effect of it I am not able to discuss on a point of order, because it might run into a discussion on the merits of the question whether silver should be circulated or not.

Mr. DINGLEY. On the point of order I desire to say that the law to-day, while it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe the denominations of United States notes, yet the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary Chase, in 1863, prescribed the denominations of United States notes, by an order of the Department, to be one dollar, two dollars, five dollars, ten dollars, and upward; and that order stands to-day under the statute as the law of the land. One and two dollar United States notes are the lawful denominations among others of United States notes at this time, and hence there can be no point of order made upon that amendment. In the amendment I have introduced I simply recite the denominations that are authorized by law, in order to point out to the Secretary of the Treasury the fact that one-dollar and two-dollar United States notes are still the lawful currency of the country. I see no point of order that can be sustained.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman concedes that what he wants to reach is in harmony with a regulation of the Treasury Department. He does not contend surely that that is the language of the law. I ask the Clerk to read section 3575.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury may provide for the engraving and preparation, and for the issue of fractional and other notes, and shall make such regulations for the redemption of such notes when mutilated or defaced, and for the receipt of fractional notes in payment of debts to the United States, except for customs, in such sums, not over $5, as may appear to him expedient.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is not the law which applies to this matter. The section which does apply to it is section 3571.

Mr. CANNON. Let that be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States notes shall be of such denominations, not less than $1, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, shall not bear interest, shall be payable to bearer, and shall be in such form as the Secretary may deem best.

Mr. RANDALL. That is more distinct than the one I had read.

Mr. DINGLEY. But I call the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania to the fact that there has never been but one order of the Secretary of the Treasury prescribing denominations of United States notes, and that was the order of Secretary C[illegible]se, that the denominations should be one dollar, two dollars, five dollars, ten dollars, and upward. No order of the Secretary of the Treasury has been issued since that time changing the denominations of the United States notes.

Mr. RANDALL. That was the policy, perhaps, of the gentleman who occupied the office of Secretary of the Treasury when such order was issued. I think I can say it is not the policy at present of that Department. I will read:

It is not the policy of the present officers of the Treasury Department to issue one and two dollar notes. No more of such notes will be printed while this policy continues.

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

Then, in addition, I have a statement from the Treasury Department which would seem to show that there are now $18,000,000 of ones out and $18,000,000 of twos.

Mr. DINGLEY. The number has been reduced over ten millions within a year and a half.

Mr. RANDALL. My statement comes down to the 1st of June, 1886.

Mr. LONG. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] claim that these words offered as an amendment would control the discretion of the Secretary?

Mr. RANDALL. I say they would change the law by depriving the Secretary of his discretion.

Mr. LONG. Would they deprive him of his discretion?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the act of 1878, which changes the sections of the Revised Statutes he refers to and limits the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. I will read it:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or other officer under him, to cancel or to retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes, and whenever any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury, under any law, from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation: Provided, That nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation or destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of other notes of like denominations in their stead, as now provided by law.

Mr. RANDALL. The whole matter is discretionary.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. When the Secretary of the Treasury under this law destroys worn-out or mutilated notes he is obliged to issue notes of like denominations. He can not issue notes of other denominations in place of the notes destroyed, and in this respect this act modifies prior statutes, and takes away the discretion which formerly resided with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. The Secretary of the Treasury has not reduced the volume of United States notes out. It is fixed by law at $346,681,016, and that is the amount that was out on the 1st of June, 1886.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But the limitation on the total volume is not the only limitation prescribed by the act of May, 1878. The reissue must be in like denominations of the notes destroyed.

Mr. RANDALL. Now the gentleman says that the Secretary was bound, under the law to which he refers, to issue again one and two dollar notes when notes came in of those denominations.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Precisely.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that under both the sections I have read the matter is left to the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But this is a subsequent act.

Mr. RANDALL. And I will show the effect of that discretion when I state the fact that on the 31st of December, 1884, there were but forty-three millions of coin out to take the place of these ones and twos, whereas under the change of policy and under the discretion exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of Bland dollars out was increased to fifty-two millions on the 31st of December, 1885.

In other words, the administration, instead of making war on the Bland dollar, as some gentlemen have intimated they have done, have, by their public acts and by the discretion which the law has given them and which they have exercised, increased the amount of those dollars nearly ten millions in the aggregate. Now, if that discretion is to be destroyed, it is to be done by the change of existing law. Hence I make the point of order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A word further, Mr. Chairman. The law to which I refer is the act of May 31, 1878, which is subsequent to any of the sections of the Revised Statutes to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers. That act, I say, not only limits the total amount of greenbacks or United States notes by prohibiting their reduction below $346,000,000, but it fixes the denomination of the notes and keeps them the same as when the act was passed. It prohibits a change in the denominations. They can not be canceled or destroyed under this act unless mutilated, and then new notes of like denominations must be issued.

Mr. RANDALL. Admitting that that is the law and is binding on the Treasury Department, the appeal should be to the Secretary of the Treasury instead of to this House, in violation of its rules as I think, asking the House to change the existing law by a new law destroying the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think the debate on this question is a little premature, as it would more properly come in on another amendment to the paragraph, but inasmuch as the subject is up I desire to be heard upon it in connection with the point of order. I defy any man, no matter how ingenious he may be, to escape the conclusion that the law peremptorily forbids changing the denominations of the Treasury notes that were outstanding May 31, 1878. I call attention to the language of the law. It has been read, but I will read it again:

From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or other officer under him, to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Secretary of the Treasury receives into the Treasury one and two dollar notes and cancels them and issues notes of other denominations, say one note for ten, I want to know if he has not then canceled ten one-dollar notes and issued one note? And I ask if this law does not clearly forbid the cancellation of those notes unless they are mutilated? And if they are mutilated, it expressly says that they shall be reissued in like denominations. Like what? In like denominations with the notes that were mutilated and canceled. There can be no mistake about that, and this law is mandatory, not directory. It says further:

And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law, from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they sha l not—

What shall not? The notes received—they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued—

What shall be reissued? The notes received—they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation.

It were impossible, sir, for human language to be plainer or more explicit. And to show that this is the meaning of it, the last clause of this act provides that "nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation, destruction, or mutilation of notes and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead, as now provided by law."

Now, what does the Secretary of the Treasury say in his letter of March 2, 1886, in response to what is known as the Bland resolution? On page 4 of that document, speaking of the circulation of the Bland dollar, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has referred and of the efforts of the Treasury Department to put it into circulation, the Secretary of the Treasury says:

I have pressed its circulation at the expense of the United States notes, ones and twos, which as fast as redeemed have been reissued only in larger denominations."

Now, I say that in thus retiring the one and two dollar notes and issuing in their stead notes of larger denominations, the Secretary of the Treasury has—I do not say intentionally—contravened squarely the provision of the law of May 31, 1878. He had no right thus to reduce our one and two dollar currency. There is no more useful currency in this country than those one and two dollar Treasury notes. People require them for change in their every-day transactions, and one purpose of this act of May 31, 1878, was to prevent the diminution of this form of our paper circulation. I call attention to contemporaneous history.

At the time of the passage of the act of May 31, 1878, the resumption act of 1875 was in full operation. One section of that resumption act provided for the retiring of Treasury notes down to $300,000,000 prior to January 1, 1879; and it was provided further that after the date named the Secretary of the Treasury could redeem the Treasury notes then outstanding, which would have taken up every dollar of these notes. At that time the Treasury Department was giving preference to the destruction of one and two dollar Treasury notes; these were being destroyed faster than notes of any other denomination; and to stop this destruction of the one and two dollar notes, as well as all other forms of Treasury notes then in circulation as money, was the reason for using the language incorporated in the act of 1878; under which act, I say, there is no discretion left in the Treasury Department either to reduce the amount of this currency or to change the denomination. Prior to the passage of the act of May 31, 1878, the Secretary of the Treasury had a discretion in this matter, and might issue Treasury notes in any denomination he saw proper; but the act of May 31, 1878, was intended to preserve the denominations and the quantity then outstanding. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment which I have prepared on this subject.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important question. The present is perhaps the only opportunity we shall have at this session to provide for the issue of notes of small denominations——

A MEMBER. A point of order is pending.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am aware of that; and therefore I want to impress on the mind of the Chair the importance of the ruling he is now to make. In order that we may save time I suggest that the Chair, in ruling upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, which relates to the Treasury notes, might indicate whether it will be in order for myself or any other member to submit an amendment to the amendment providing for the issue of silver certificates in denominations of one, two and five dollars. There is a demand from every section of this country for silver certificates and Treasury notes of these denominations. I trust, therefore, the Chair will indicate his opinion whether we may now have an opportunity to provide for the issue of such notes. The opportunity of compelling the Treasury Department to issue these notes has thus far not arisen.

Mr. RANDALL. The matter just suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is a different subject altogether from the pending question of order. Now, Mr. Chairman, complaint is made in regard to the administration of the existing law in reference to one and two dollar notes. This is a concession that to accomplish what these gentlemen desire something must be added to the existing law. I say, then, that by the admission of gentlemen who advocate the amendment it is a change of existing law.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, one word upon the point of order. It seems to me that the act of 1878, which has been read by the gentleman from Ohio, was intended to repeal simply so much of the resumption act as provided for the retirement of 80 per cent. of legal-tender notes when national-bank notes were issued. The resumption act provided that $300,000,000 of legal-tender notes should be the maximum amount outstanding, and provided for the contraction of such currency down to that amount. The act of 1878 was evidently intended to repeal so much of the resumption act as limited the amount of legal-tender notes to $300,000,000. The act provided:

And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law, from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but shall be reissued, paid out again, and kept in circulation.

It will hardly be contended, Mr. Chairman, that this does away with the discretionary power of the Secretary of the Treasury under prior statutes to determine the denominations of legal-tender notes. I believe the highest denomination which can be issued is $10,000, but between $1 and $10,000 there is a discretionary power which has always been exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury as to the denominations in which the legal-tender notes shall be issued.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There had been such discretion up to the time of the passage of the act of 1878.

Mr. BLAND. That is true; but the act of 1878 was intended merely to prohibit the reduction of the legal-tender circulation below $346,000,000, the resumption act having provided that it should not be reduced below $300,000,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Can the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of 1878, cancel any United States note unless it is mutilated?

Mr. BLAND. I think there is no question on that point.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] is correct in his construction of the law, I ask him what meaning he gives to the language which says that these notes shall be reissued in like denominations?

Mr. BLAND. It does not say that.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It does. Listen.

Mr. BLAND. That is when mutilated notes are destroyed.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa (reading):

And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be r tired, canceled or destroyed, but shall be reissued and paid out again, and kept in circulation: Provided, That nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation or destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead.

Mr. BLAND. That is instead of mutilated notes. That simply means where notes come in and are mutilated parties can have other notes of like denomination to replace them.

Mr. NEECE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly.

Mr. NEECE. What does the statute mean by "notes of like denomination?"

Mr. BLAND. That is applied to mutilated notes.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. So that no notes would be retired or canceled.

Mr. BLAND. That is very true. The object of the law was to fix the amount of legal-tenders at $346,000,000. I do not desire to go into the discussion of the merits of this matter. While it may be true the people may have occasion for the use of one and two dollar bills, yet if we are disposed to put coin into circulation there is only one way to do it. We can never force gold or silver into circulation until paper money is withdrawn. The statistics show that we coin about 80 per cent. of gold in twenty-dollar pieces. That is not coined for circulation, but it is coined for the convenience of the banks. If the policy of putting coin into circulation is to be authorized we should coin gold into five and ten dollar pieces, and withdraw all paper money from circulation under five or ten dollar bills. I speak only as a matter of policy.

The large amount of coin kept in circulation in France is because it is coined into small pieces and no small denominations of paper money are put into circulation.

While I say it is a matter of policy to be decided by Congress and without expressing any view on that subject, still under this law I claim the Secretary of the Treasury is not prohibited from exercising that discretion he has always exercised in determining what denominations of legal-tender notes may be issued. I do not think the law was intended to do away with that discretion.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Chairman, we have a statute evidently intended to protect the country in its circulating medium. It takes from the Secretary of the Treasury all power to determine what kind of money shall circulate among the people. That question is fixed by law, which has been passed by Congress. This amendment secures the continuance of that law. We have provided when one and two dollar notes are taken into the Treasury they shall be reissued in like denominations. I ask now whether they are reissued in like denominations? If we take the report of the Secretary of the Treasury we will find they are not reissued in like denominations. In other words, the law is not executed, and I believe this amendment ought to be adopted.

The people should determine, and not the Seeretary of the Treasury, what kind of money should circulate. I am in favor of silver circulation, but I am not in favor of the forcing against the will of the people the circulating of silver in place of one and two dollar bills. I am not in favor of those one and two dollar bills being taken out of the circulating medium. They are convenient and many times preferred to silver. I say we should compel the Secretary of the Treasury when one and two dollar bills are taken into the Treasury to reissue them in accordance with the plain provision of the law. There is an opinion gaining ground in this country that the people are not competent to judge for themselves the kind of money they shall have. That opinion may do for some countries, but will not be tolerated in this.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I must dissent respectfully from the opinion given by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] as to the possible construction of this law. I call attention again to the act of May 31, 1878, prohibiting any further destruction of the greenback currency. It provides in terms, and we must always get the meaning of a law from the language itself when not ambiguous, that when Treasury notes are received into the Treasury and belong to the Government, from any source whatever, they, the notes received, should not be canceled or destroyed—that is the language—but should be paid out again. Having once been paid out and come back into the Treasury in the course of business, they should again be paid out and kept in circulation—that is, the specific notes; showing that the legislator had two things in his mind when framing this law—first, the prevention of the destruction of any more of the greenbacks; and, second, the preservation of the denominations of notes then outstanding. There can be no other construction of it. It is manifest upon its face that that was the purpose of the law.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I remember very well when that law was discussed and passed, and there was a fear in the House at that time that possibly an unfriendly Secretary of the Treasury, or one who might come in afterward, would so manipulate the currency as to secure the issue only of large bills, and take the small notes, with the advantages they carry with them, from the people.

Mr. RYAN. The discussion at that time shows plainly that fact.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly. There can be no doubt but that was the apprehension prevailing, and this was to prevent that very thing from being done. I was engaged in the currency controversy at that time throughout the country, and not only did that fear obtain in Congress, but the practice obtained at that time in the Treasury Department of canceling a larger proportion of the ones and twos than of the larger denominations. There seemed to be a purpose in withdrawing them from circulation, and this statute was framed for the very purpose of preventing that. From its plain and unmistakable construction the Secretary of the Treasury had no right, in order to advance silver circulation, to make war upon the one and two dollar notes.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he did not make war upon the silver dollars. That is a question about which there is a difference of opinion, and I would like to have an opportunity of meeting the gentleman in discussion upon this floor on that very point for about one hour; but we have not the time for that now. But it is certain that he made war upon the one and two dollar notes in violation of this statute to which I have referred of May 31, 1878. I do not pretend to say that he did it knowingly, but wittingly or otherwise he violated the statute when he canceled the one and two dollar notes and issued larger denominations in their stead.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have only to say that the Secretary of the Treasury is acting under existing law. If he disobeys the law, that is one thing; but neither he nor we have anything to do with the purposes or motives of the men who passed the law. He reads the law as he finds it on the statute-book, and by its provisions his course of conduct is regulated.

He has in pursuance of the law marked out a course of procedure, and this amendment proposes by a change of the language of the law to compel him to go from that line, and therefore it is a change of existing law, and can not be in order on this bill. No matter what the object is, it is a change of the statute.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman if the Secretary of the Treasury has not authority now to issue one and two dollar notes?

Mr. RANDALL. He may or may not have it under the existing law; that is a question; but your proposition is to change the law so as to compel him to act differently.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It makes no change in the law; it makes an appropriation for the preservation of the one and two dollar notes and to prevent their withdrawal and the issuing of other and larger notes in exchange.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the question of order.

By the act of 1869 provision is made for the retirement and cancellation of the $400,000,000 of outstanding legal-tenders. The act of May, 1878, to which reference has been made in this discussion, had for its object the arrest of the process of the withdrawal and cancellation of the legal-tender notes. It was provided that when they were paid into the Treasury they should not be retired or canceled, but reissued; but as to the denominations in which they were to be reissued, that is not specified until we come to the proviso, which has sole reference to the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of others of like denominations. In point of fact one and two dollar notes are not now issued. The law must be changed in order to enable the issue of them. That is the object of the amendment which is now pending and against which the point of order is made. But as it is not provided by law, the Chair must sustain the point of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I most respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine appealing from the decision of the Chair, the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and there were on a division—ayes 62, noes 71.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. DINGLEY were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 85.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I now offer another amendment to come in after the words "United States," in line 274. This amendment is not a violation of the law, because it is a provision having direct reference to the subject and in line with its purpose. I propose to insert, after the words "United States," as follows: "Including one and two dollar United States notes."

Mr. RANDALL. That is the same thing.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No, it is quite different; it is certainly not subject to the point of order. The law authorizes——

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be reported from the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "United States," in line 274, insert:
"Including one and two dollar United States notes."

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There can be no question, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, about that amendment. The law authorizes the reissue of United States notes whenever they are destroyed because of being worn out. In other words, it provides for the issue of notes to replace mutilated notes of all denominations; and by inserting the words here "including one and two dollar notes" you certainly make no extension of the law; it is no limitation on the present law, but an appropriation for a specific purpose already authorized by law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move to amend the amendment by adding "and silver certificates?"

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. Is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. It was ruled out on a point of order, and the decision of the Chair was sustained by the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. There is no law authorizing the issue of silver certificates of one and two dollar denominations. That is new legislation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is no question about that, that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is subject to the point of order, being new legislation, but the amendment I have offered is not legislation in any sense. It seems to me perfectly clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. RANDALL. I now make the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio send the Chair the law?

Mr. RANDALL. I will now say a word on this proposition. It does add to the law, and therefore changes the law, and the avowed object is to do something to compel a different administration of the law; and to compel a different administration of the law it is necessary to change the existing law under which the Secretary now acts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. This act of 1878 arrested the cancellation of United States notes to the amount of about $46,000,000, and it contained this proviso:

That nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes, and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead, as now provided by law.

The only provision in this law for the issuance of notes is to supply the place of mutilated and canceled notes. It seems to the Chair the point of order clearly lies against the amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I offer another amendment, to insert these words:

Including the issue of one and two dollar notes of the United States to take the place of mutilated and canceled notes of like denominations.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that that is a change of existing law.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Existing law is one thing and the practice of a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury is a wholly distinct thing. My friend from Pennsylvania is confusing those two things.

Mr. RANDALL. I very often do get things confused, and do not wonder at it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The amendment last proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is exactly in the language of existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. Then it is not necessary, and the Secretary of the Treasury will carry out existing law as understood by the Treasury Department.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But the Secretary of the Treasury is not the officer to construe the law. It is for Congress to make the Secretary of the Treasury obey the law.

Mr. RANDALL. I think he is doing so.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I think not. And Congress should have an opportunity to express itself by a vote on this question.

Mr. RANDALL. The only difference between the gentleman from Kansas and myself is that he wishes something done and wants to provide a law to compel the Secretary to do it. I want him to exercise the discretion lodged in him by existing law.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. He is not obeying the existing law.

Mr. MILLS. The existing law provides that whenever mutilated notes are returned to the Treasury they shall be reissued in like denominations. If a one-dollar bill or if ten one-dollar bills that are mutilated are returned to the Treasury it is the duty of the Secretary to issue ten new one-dollar bills in lieu of them. That I understand to be the law; but the provision offered by my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is to make an appropriation to carry out that law. That is all there is about it. Now there is no appropriation to pay for the issuance of notes in place of the mutilated ones. It is not to issue more new notes, but it is to comply with the provision of the law relating to the issue of notes of like denominations in place of those mutilated.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit there is no appropriation in this amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. We can add that hereafter.

Mr. RYAN. The amendment does not provide an appropriation. That can be provided for elsewhere if it be desirable to have one and two dollar notes reissued. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is of no consequence if it does not change existing law has some significance. It is, however, of consequence in this respect only, that it is a sort of suggestion by the legislative body of the Government to the Executive that they desire to have ones and twos reissued, and nothing more. The amendment itself does not change existing law. It does not affect existing law in any particular whatever, and the only significance it has or can possibly have is, as I before stated, to suggest to the Secretary of the Treasury that it is the judgment of the law-making body of this country that he ought to issue ones and twos in lieu of the returned mutilated notes.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Kansas gives away the whole case. When the gentleman wants to make a legal suggestion to the executive officers of the Government he ought to so frame his statutes that they will not be in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This simply provides that out of the appropriation which this paragraph carries, of over $300,000, there may be used such sum as may be required to carry out the law in that regard; that is, to provide for the reissue of one and two dollar notes in place of one and two dollar mutilated notes canceled and retired. The law authorizes it now; but this authorizes the application of some part of this appropriation to that object, and that is all it does.

Mr. BLAND. Gentlemen seem to overlook the fact that this act simply provides that it shall not be construed to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury issuing like denominations for mutilated notes. It does not say that he shall do it. The preceding part of the act provides that the legal-tender currency shall not be reduced below $346,000,000, and changes the law which provided for the issue of $300,000,000. Now this proviso simply means that the law shall not be construed to prevent the issuing of like denominations. It does not take away the discretion of the Secretary at all. There is no intention in the act to take away the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to these denominations, and hence the provision is made that the act shall not be construed to prevent him from issuing like denominations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make one or two remarks with regard to the policy of this amendment. One is that the law now on the statute-book requires the Treasury Department to keep in circulation $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes. There is a discrimination everywhere against the circulation of silver. Why? It is coined by the Government on Government account, and is piled up in the Treasury, and paid out only at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The law provides for the circulation of legal-tender notes by providing that the volume shall not be reduced below $346,000,000.

The moment you pass any law here providing for one and two dollar greenback bills you do not increase the circulation of greenbacks a dollar. What do you do? You simply drive out of circulation about $50,000,000 now in circulation and pile it up in the Treasury. That is all your law operates to do; that is all it will do; and I do not understand why gentlemen here insist that we shall go on and issue one and two dollar legal-tender notes when the law already provides that the legal-tender currency shall be kept in circulation so that there is no necessity of making a vacuum for it. But, provide for issuing one and two dollar coin certificates and you force silver into circulation. My policy would be to let the legal-tender notes stand where they are. I would withdraw them and not issue them under $20, thus making room for one and two dollar coin notes issued upon silver. That is the sort of legislation we ought to enact here, because silver needs legislation to get it into circulation, while greenbacks need none. And I am astonished that gentlemen will undertake to drive out of circulation forty or fifty millions when we have not got enough in circulation now. There is no question that this amendment is in violation of existing law, because it changes the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury in this regard. I am not upholding the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasurer.

I am mindful of the fact that no doubt they have withdrawn one and two dollar greenback bills in order to get out silver, because they believed that the silver dollar would be unpopular among the people and that a cry would be raised against it. But the fact is otherwise. Silver goes into circulation, and the longer it remains in circulation and the more of it you put in circulation the more popular and the more stable its circulation will be and the more difficult it will be to induce the people to give it up. Now, it is bad policy for those here who advocate silver circulation to drive it out by putting out these bills and calling in the silver now in circulation and piling it up in the vaults of the Treasury. On the other hand, there is a bill pending here for the purpose of issuing one and two dollar silver certificates. I would amend that so as to call them "coin notes," and require the coin notes to be issued upon all the gold and silver in the Treasury. I would take care of that; the greenback is able to take care of itself. The law takes care of it.

Mr. NEECE. Not unless it is enforced.

Mr. BLAND. Not that I object to legal-tender notes. I am as strongly in favor of greenbacks as any gentleman upon this floor; but I do not desire to see them put forward at the expense of silver.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish the Chair would do so, because I wish to speak on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that this amendment relates simply to the reissue of mutilated notes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mutilated notes only.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire now to say a word upon the merits of the amendment in reply to my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

There is now no law authorizing the issue of silver certificates of denominations below $10 or gold certificates of denominations below $20. There is great need in the country for small bills. There is a demand for them everywhere, and for my part I prefer to let the people themselves choose which form of currency they will take, whether greenbacks or silver, whether paper representing the coin or coin itself. There is nothing gained by forcing the circulation of either silver or gold coin. The policy of all enlightened nations has come to be to allow the people to decide whether they will take coin or paper in equal amount. It is not the form in which money circulates, but the quantity, that signifies.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. Does not the gentleman know that under the law as it now exists, and as enforced by the Treasury Department, if you compel the issue of one and two dollar greenbacks one-half of the silver will be driven out of circulation?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This measure will not necessarily drive silver out of circulation or lessen the total money volume. Another law controls the volume of metallic or convertible money; that is the law of the equilibrium of currencies among nations. You may provide for a given proportion of the circulation to be in the form of small bills, or you may limit the total quantity of paper, and leave the denominations to be determined by the demands of trade for them. The total volume, which is, I say, the only question of significance, will not be different in either case. Whether one and two dollar greenbacks be issued, or only fives and tens and larger denominations, the total volume will remain the same, and the quantity of silver that circulates as coin, or by certificates, will not be materially changed. Inasmuch, then, as no silver certificates of small denominations are provided for, why deprive the people of the convenience of small United States notes? As business is carried on in this country small notes are necessary, and if the people choose to use small legal-tender notes I have no objection, and I do not think there is any valid objection to them. Small notes, I say, will not lessen the silver part of our money volume. To the extent people prefer silver dollars they can have them, or they can have certificates in denominations of ten dollars and upward. All the silver in the country can go into circulation in that way now.

All that is required is to pay out the surplus in the Treasury on the interest-bearing debt and then collect no more in taxes—and my friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will agree with me on that—than is required to carry on the Government. Then your money will all be in the hands of the people, either in the form of small bills, larger notes, or coin. It is always safe to leave a question of this kind to be determined by the people themselves. I have no desire to force into circulation silver dollars if the people prefer the paper representatives. The controlling question is always the volume of money, for on that depend prices and commercial activity. The question as to particular denominations which shall circulate is a matter of convenience to be left to the people.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has had a great deal of trouble about the silver dollar. Now, I have regarded him as a safe leader in behalf of the silver dollar. I begin to have some doubt of my leader, although I have followed him in all his silver projects during this session of Congress. Now, sir, he advises a direct violation of the law in order to get his silver dollar into circulation

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that has got to be done I will no longer follow my friend from Missouri. I believe the best way is to have the circulating medium the people want and to obey the law. I would not leave it to the President, or the Secretary of the Treasury, to determine what the law shall be. The law should be made by the law-making power of the Government. They will do what the people want, or at least ought to.

Where are the one and two dollar notes to-day. Why, sir, they are being destroyed? I ask by what power they are being destroyed. The law forbids their destruction. Why are they not reissued by the Government? I will tell you why. It is because no money has been appropriated to provide for their reissue—an indirect way to accomplish what can not be done directly. The omission to appropriate the necessary amount to reissue is taken as a justification by the Secretary of the Treasury for not reissuing the mutilated currency after it has been received by the Treasury. And when those in charge of the law see that Congress neglects its duty, then it does not take a great stretch of conscience to suspend the law entirely and set up the one man will. In the Forty-eighth Congress, where the proposition to suspend the issuing of one and two dollar greenbacks was voted down by almost a two-thirds vote, yet by the omission of the necessary appropriation to reissue those notes, the refusal to reissue was accomplished, and scarcely any one understood how it was done.

Let us look for a moment at the law which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] advises we shall violate. It is the act of May 31, 1878. It has already been referred to by my friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], but I will read it again:

> That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or other officer under him, to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes. And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and put out again and kept in circulation.

What is it that is to be put out again by the Treasurer? Why the very notes received by him; not a substitute or its equivalent in amount. He has no discretion over it. The reissue and to keep in circulation mean to pay and circulate the very identical bills taken in unless they are mutilated, and then they are to be reissued in like denomination that the Secretary receives, if he receives one-dollar notes, five-dollar notes, ten-dollar notes, and twenty-dollar notes. He has no power to cancel or destroy them. He is compelled to reissue them if mutilated, and if not, to keep them in circulation; and now, in case he shall receive mutilated notes, the law attempted to protect them for circulation the same as those not mutilated. Therefore, it provided for their reissue in like denomination—not quantity nor like amount, but like denomination—to again assume their place as the circulating medium. The proviso was added to the act so there could be no destruction or change in amount or denomination. The provision reads as follows:

> Provided, That nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes and reissue of other notes of like denomination in their stead as now provided by law.

It will thus be seen that the law is imperative, leaving no discretion in the hands of the administration. It provides that these notes shall be reissued precisely as they were at the date of the passage of the act.

I take it for granted, Mr. Chairman, before we can complain of the Secretary of the Treasury we should appropriate sufficient money to carry out the law in its fullest extent. If then he shall violate it, he will be at fault; but the fault at present rests with this Congress for not appropriating sufficient money for the purpose of executing the law. When we have done that we shall have done our duty, and then we shall have the right to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to do his duty.

If the Secretary of the Treasury can refuse to reissue the one and two dollar bills and to keep them in circulation as provided for by the act referred to, then with no greater stretch of the law he can refuse to coin the silver that is provided for by the law which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has given himself so much trouble about. If this law is to be violated, ignored, or suspended, then we had better let those whose duty it is to carry out the law be the judges as to the extent, policy, and manner of violation. I insist on a strict compliance with the law by those whose duty it is to execute it.

My point is, the people should be the judges of the kind of money which shall circulate. It should be and is fixed by a positive statute so plain that no lawyer or judge in my opinion would risk his reputation by saying that when certain bills of the denominations of ones and twos are received by the Secretary of the Treasury he may withhold them and put in circulation bills of like amount of some other denomination. If that construction is given the statute we may find ourselves with bills not less than five hundred or one thousand dollars in circulation. Then what becomes of the language in the law "of like denomination?" Is a fifty-dollar bill of like denomination, of fifty one-dollar bills? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] says it will drive silver out of circulation. If silver will not circulate along with our greenbacks after giving it an equal chance under the law, then we must let it go. This is a question of executing the law on our part. Shall we appropriate the necessary money to have the law executed?

Mr. DINGLEY. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is substantially the same as the one I have offered, and I trust the committee will adopt it.

It appears from the report of the Comptroller of the Treasury for the last year the volume of one and two dollar United States notes has been reduced from fifty-eight millions to forty-six millions notwithstanding our increasing population. The people of this country, Mr. Chairman, believe that one and two dollar notes are necessary for the transaction of their business. Complaints are coming to me every week and almost every day from various parts of the country to the effect the business of the country is suffering from a dearth of one and two dollar notes.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DINGLEY. No, I can not yield.

A large portion of the business of this country is conducted through the mails by the remittance of one and two dollar notes. But a small portion of the post-offices of the country are money-order offices, and it is absolutely necessary for the transaction of important branches of business that the people should be provided with one and two dollar notes. I do not believe any important object can be obtained by limiting these notes, which are so convenient, and to which they have become so attached, and to which the business of the country has been adapted.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] suggests that in furnishing the people with one and two dollar notes we will serve to prevent the increase of silver dollars. How that may be I do not know; but I believe the people of the country ought to be given that currency which they find to be the most convenient, whether it is silver dollars or whether it is paper notes. I trust, therefore, while the amendment is in the nature of moral direction it may have the effect. The people of the country should be supplied with sufficient one and two dollar notes. The interests of the business of the nation require it, and I sincerely hope that this amendment will be adopted, now that an opportunity is offered.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am not astonished that the gentleman from Maine should have declined to yield for an interruption. I wanted to ask him if he was in favor of issuing one and two dollar silver certificates?

Mr. DINGLEY. I voted for the report of that bill.

Mr. BLAND. Then I want your co-operation to get up that bill and secure its adoption by the House. That will afford real relief.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman must very well understand that there is very little possibility or probability of securing action upon that matter by the House at this late date in the session.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman desires that bill to be passed, and his friends on that side who have been hostile to silver will assist, there will be no trouble in getting it up.

But there is an effort to crowd through an amendment of this kind with reference to the one and two dollar bills, and thus do away with the necessity of that bill. Now, that is just what I denounce. I want that bill to be taken up, considered, and passed. If the House wants one and two dollar bills, let them pass that bill and issue silver certificates, and not drive $50,000,000 out of circulation by putting through an amendment of this kind on this bill. Therefore, when the gentleman from Maine and others whom I know have been hostile to silver favor such an amendment as this on the present bill, my suspicions are aroused, because I can see but one possible reason for it. There is no difficulty in getting that bill before the House if gentlemen really desire it. I am not opposed to the issue of the one and the two dollar notes in that shape; but what I oppose is the idea or the proposition here of putting the one and two dollar bills in the shape of an amendment upon this bill, and thereby driving silver out of circulation. It is not possible by such means to do the greenback circulation any good whatever. That circulation is kept up by law, and we want law to keep up every other circulation.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Why does not your Secretary of the Treasury issue one and two dollar notes?

Mr. BLAND. Because, I have no doubt, the idea is by forcing silver into circulation to make it unpopular among the people.

Mr. NEECE. Let me ask my friend from Missouri if he is not willing to allow the people to have the one and two dollar bills or the silver dollars, just as they see proper? Does he not want them to have a choice?

Mr. BLAND. That is just what I claim. I do not propose to deny them that privilege, but I want to issue them as certificates in order to get more money into circulation. I do not want to discriminate against silver. I repeat, the law keeps the greenbacks out already, and there is no trouble about that circulation. It is fixed by law; it must be kept in circulation. But, on the other hand, silver circulation is placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury and at his discretion, and I want to take that discretion from him. You can easily do that if you will let this question alone here and join with me in securing the consideration of that bill providing for the issuing of one and two dollar silver certificates.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to know from my friend from Missouri, in view of his recent statement, how the law keeps the greenback out any more than it does the silver dollars?

Mr. BLAND. Because the law says that it shall be kept out. It specifies the amount of $346,000,000 to be in circulation.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes, but people will take as many greenbacks as they please and just as much silver as they please. Now, the gentleman seems to want to have the law in such shape as to force the silver into circulation.

Mr. BLAND. Precisely.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And in that I claim the gentleman gives away his whole case.

Mr. BLAND. I give away nothing. I want the law framed in such shape that it will take this money out of the Treasury and not permit it to be locked up there at the discretion of any official of this Government. I understand the position of the gentleman from Maine. All of them are hostile to silver money and make war on it. You have an opportunity to get it into circulation, and to get the one and two dollar bills also, if the law is passed to which I refer.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], and I must say that I am very much astonished. He discusses this question as if there were a sufficient amount of money in circulation.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I am arguing just the contrary. If the gentleman will allow me to say, I was suggesting that this proposition would withdraw $50,000,000. You drive it out of circulation.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Well, the gentleman's position is not tenable. He discusses it as though there were a sufficient amount of money in circulation, and as though the question is whether we shall have greenbacks or silver.

By the act of 1878 authorizing the coinage of the Bland dollar provision was made for silver circulation. That act was followed in May, 1878, by the act prohibiting the further destruction of greenbacks and prohibiting any change in their denominations. It was evidently the intention of the same Congress that passed the two acts that hereafter the circulation—I mean the legal tender of the country—should be gold, silver, and greenbacks, a trinity of legal-tender money. Now, the resumption act of 1875 authorized the coinage of half-dollars, quarter-dollars, and 10-cent pieces, and the Bland act authorized the coinage of the silver dollar. The other act of Congress provided that there should be greenbacks in denominations of one, two, five, and ten dollars, and so on; and that three kinds of money, silver, gold, and legal-tenders, should circulate together.

Now the gentleman says this amendment was hostile to the silver dollar. Not at all. Is there no other way to get it in circulation except to provide for one and two dollar silver certificates? I give the gentleman from Missouri notice that I am just as good a silver man as he is, but if the fight comes as between the greenback and silver I am for greenbacks. Is there no way to get silver into circulation except by destroying our greenbacks? Lo, "I show you a more excellent way!" Pay it out on the public debt. If we have got to retire the greenback to get silver into circulation I stand by the greenback, and so do the people generally, because the greenback is far more convenient. But no such conflict is necessary. There is ample room in this country for the circulation of all the gold we can get, and all the silver that will come to us, and of all the greenbacks now authorized by law, and a great deal more. The people are perishing for it all over the country.

I have been considered by some people rather extreme in my notions of finance. But I have always been in favor of gold, silver, and paper money, all issued by the Government and all full legal tender, and properly limited in amount. I have before me the Washington Post of this morning, and to show this committee the progress we are making in favor of a rational currency system I will quote from an editorial in that paper of to-day:

> Paper, in the delicate qualities now manufactured, is so much more agreeable and convenient to handle than either silver or gold, that it seems certain that it will be wholly substituted for them in the near future, and that the precious metals will not be used as currency except the little silver that is needed for subsidiary coin.

If any Greenbacker had said as much he would have been laughed at from Maine to California, from the lakes to Mobile Bay. But furthermore this editor says:

> A question worth settling is whether it is longer necessary to coin metals which, however valuable as tokens of solvency, are no longer used as coins anywhere in America or Europe except in a small way.

Well, sir, we are making some progress, and I congratulate the country, I congratulate the Democratic party, I congratulate this House that the greenback schoolmaster has been abroad and that his teachings have been listened to. The greenback apostle went out before the people, taking his life and reputation in his hand, to advocate a correct system of American finance.

Mr. ROWELL. Has it captured the Post?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes, it seems so, truly; and we mean to keep on until we capture all the parties in this country and inaugurate a sensible system of finance—gold, silver, paper, all issued by the Government and all a full legal tender.

Mr. SYMES. My friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] offered his amendment, as I understand, because he says he sees no possibility of getting the silver-certificate bill before the House this session. If I watched the silver debate in this House with any degree of correctness for two continuous months there is not a man to-day out of the three hundred and twenty-five members on this floor who is not in favor of the silver-certificate bill. However much gentlemen may have differed upon the coinage measures, upon free coinage, upon limited coinage, or any other kind of coinage, there was during the whole of that debate no difference of opinion upon the proposition that silver at least should be used in this country as a subsidiary coin, and be a legal tender for all debts, public and private, for a hundred dollars or more.

Why, sir, the most crystallized gold-bug from Wall street, New York, advocated upon this floor that silver should at least take the place in this country of all small bills. But, sir, all must know that the people of this country do not desire, or a certain portion of them at least, to carry around silver dollars in their pockets to any large extent. We all know that a very large class of people, as has been truly said by my friend from Maine, do business by transmitting small bills through the mail. Those small bills are becoming scarce, and I have no doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury has been drawing in one and two dollar greenbacks and putting out silver dollars as he pretends, or trying to put them out in their place, for the sole and only purpose of making silver dollars in the coined form odious in this country.

Why, sir, we saw the Representative from New York [Mr. HEWITT] hold up four silver dollars which he said he had been compelled to take.

He said this with the same air as a New York dude will quarrel with the barber when he gives him $4 in change, which is more money than the Almighty or his education will enable him to earn honestly. And still the aforesaid gentleman when I asked if he would support the bill to provide for the use of one and two dollar certificates by the Treasury evaded the question. This shows the good faith of the gentleman toward silver.

Then it is a fact we all admit, the free-coinage man, the limited-coinage man, the gold-bug, and he who is in favor of suspending silver coinage until the nations of Europe shall join with us in an international coinage—all, I say, must be in favor of the silver certificate bill, which requires the Secretary to issue $75,000 in one and two dollar certificates on the silver dollars in the Treasury, because they all desire silver to be used in small transactions, and they all desire an increase of small bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired——

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any necessity that this discussion on the greenback and the silver dollar should continue any longer. In the controversy between the two, I want to be exactly fair to both if I can, and to that end I think we had better now close the debate upon this paragraph.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I want to make a statement with reference to the condition of the bill that has been mentioned here and the probability of its being passed. We have a continuing order, adopted on the 26th of April, which sets apart one day, and continues that order until the end of this Congress, for the purpose of considering and passing that bill. The order excepts appropriation bills, revenue bills, and prior orders. So, according to my understanding, there is nothing now in the way of that bill under the rules except the bills to forfeit land grants and one other prior order.

Mr. BLAND. There is nothing whatever in the way. If the majority of the House want to consider it they can consider it at any time.

Mr. MILLER. They can consider it, of course, but I say that, simply taking the precedence to which it is entitled under the rules and the order of the House, it will come up as soon as the appropriation bills are disposed of.

With reference to the matter of it there is no question that the people of this country desire paper circulation. They do not want gold. It appears by an examination of the returns from the custom-house in New York city, that great commercial center where the gold of the country is hoarded, that less than 1 per cent. of the revenue that is paid into the custom-house is in gold, and less than one-half per cent. is in silver. Thus it appears that over 98½ per cent. of the revenues of this Government derived from duties are paid into the Treasury in paper money.

Now, sir, there is a reason for this. We have a widely extended country; we have a great many centers of trade; there is hardly a man in business in any country village who does not buy his goods at eight or ten different places. He has to make his remittances in money, because the produce is sold at one season of the year and the money comes back, and the goods have to be bought at another season and the money has to be remitted for them. Now, it costs just about six times as much to ship silver as to ship currency, and it costs about three times as much to ship gold as it costs to ship currency. So that our people have not taken to the use of paper money without good reason. They use that money because of its convenience of handling and its general convenience. We ship money from New York to San Francisco and to Mexico and all over this broad continent. We are not a compact nation, and our money has to move rapidly, because we have less circulation per capita than any other people on the face of the earth, whereas, from the wide expanse of our territory, we ought to have the largest volume of circulation. Hence the necessity of our money moving rapidly and of its being in a form that can be cheaply handled and transported. But in order to circulate that money two or three things ought to be done. One is to relieve the Treasury.

It is true that the issue of greenbacks would answer the purposes of the people just as well as the issue of silver certificates, but you have a coinage act by which you are continually coining and hoarding up coin in the Treasury. You are thus accumulating a burden, for it will not circulate among the people because it is coin. Your gold and your silver do not circulate, but if you issued silver certificates based upon silver lying in the Treasury you would put into circulation $89,000,000 that we now have there, and to that extent you would increase the circulation of the country; you would give the people that much more money, and that is an object to be desired. If, on the other hand, you issue these one and two dollar notes you do not put another dollar in circulation beyond what is already out, but if you issue one and two dollar silver certificates you do put into immediate circulation these eighty-nine millions of silver which are now lying idle in the Treasury, and which amount to $1.50 per capita for every person in the United States.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] seems to desire is an unfair advantage for his silver dollar. Now, these silver dollars are coined at the rate of two million per month, and the people can get them if they want them. The gentleman gives away his case when he says that he desires an unfair discrimination against the greenback in order to force his currency into circulation.

Now, all that we ask for the greenback is that it shall be issued in denominations of one and two dollars, so that the people may have an opportunity to get these small notes if they want them. We do not ask that silver shall be tabooed in order to force greenbacks upon the people. By no means. Ever since the greenback was backed up by gold—that is ever since the resumption of specie payments—the greenback has been able to stand upon its own legs.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], in order to force the silver dollar into circulation, wants to say to the people, "One and two dollar greenbacks shall not be issued; you shall not have them because we want you to take our coin; we know you will not take it unless you are compelled to, and we mean to compel you to take it by withholding from you the greenback which you want."

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman allow me now to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SYMES. I want to know how the people can get these silver dollars out of the Treasury, if they want them, as the gentleman has stated they can do.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The people can get all the silver dollars they want in the city of Washington or anywhere in this country, and a great many more than they want. They can get more than they can carry in their pockets, more than they can carry away in bags. They have only to ask them from the cashier, who is ever ready to hand them over.

Mr. SYMES. My friend is not answering my question. I want to know how any person out of the sixty million people of this country can get out of the Treasury of the United States one of those silver dollars piled up there.

Mr. MILLIKEN. They can put in a quid pro quo, and take the silver dollars in the same way as they would take any other currency.

Mr. SYMES. No, sir; they can not do anything of the kind.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The silver dollars are not locked up in the Treasury, but are forced into circulation so far as they can be. Everybody is offered silver. You have more of it offered you than you want at any restaurant.

Mr. SYMES. I dispute the gentleman's proposition. The gentleman is pettifogging with this matter when he says we can go to a restaurant and get silver. He does not answer my proposition that a man can not take a silver dollar from the Treasury of the United States unless——

Mr. MILLIKEN. It is no use for the gentleman to quibble on a simple point. He knows that every man in this country can get every silver dollar he wants, and more than he wants.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I hope now the debate may be closed on this amendment by common consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will now be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "United States," in line 274, insert "including reissue of one and two dollar United States notes to take the place of mutilated and canceled notes of like denomination.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 62, noes 76.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I make the point that no quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 87.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union rose informally, when a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 856) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Dayton, Ohio.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. LOGAN, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. GORMAN.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows;

After the word "Treasury," in line 279, add the following:

"Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes of large denomination in lieu of notes of a small denomination canceled or retired."

Mr. RANDALL. That is subject to a point of order.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly it is not. I would like to hear what point of order the gentleman can raise against it.

Mr. RANDALL. It changes existing law. The proviso embodied in the gentleman's amendment is not the law now.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I wish to be heard on the point of order. The amendment does not change existing law, but is simply a limitation upon the disbursement of money appropriated in the bill. It provides that no portion of this money shall be expended for issuing notes of large denominations in lieu of those of small denominations canceled or destroyed.

Mr. RANDALL. That is clearly new legislation.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. If there is no appropriation for that purpose, of course no small notes will be retired and large ones issued in their stead. I am astonished at the position taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. You need not be.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will point out the cause of my astonishment. The gentleman from Pennsylvania sustained the provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill that no part of the civil-service appropriation should be available until the commission had certified to each Department the names of all eligibles who had been examined before that commission.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is mistaken; I did not sustain it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Did not sustain it?

Mr. RANDALL. I was in favor of the provision; but I took the ground that it was in violation of the rules.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I heard the gentleman's ingenious speech.

Mr. RANDALL. There was no ingenuity about it; I was flat-footed, as I always am.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I did not hear the gentleman say that the provision was in violation of the rules of the House. But certainly the present amendment does not change any law.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, it does; otherwise it would not be offered.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman now to point out the law it changes.

Mr. RANDALL. We have heard the law, we have heard the regulations of the Department; we know what is the present policy of the Department and what its procedure is. If this proposition did not contemplate a change of law designed to bring about a different course of action on the part of the executive officers it would not be offered.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does the gentleman contend we are compelled to appropriate money and change the denomination of these greenbacks? Certainly not. The gentleman claimed where the bill changed the salary of an officer by appropriating less than the law allowed, appropriating $4,500 when the law fixed the salary at $5,000, it was not subject to the point of order, and he was clearly right. But he claims that an amendment which withholds—which appropriates nothing to change the denominations of greenbacks is subject to the point of order. In other words, his position is plainly and clearly this, that it is the duty of this House, under the law, to appropriate money to change the denomination of our greenbacks. The two positions are irreconcilable and untenable.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman wants an appropriation of money, and he wants to say in this bill how it shall be expended, contrary to the discretion lodged with the Secretary of the Treasury in the existing statute.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that is a change of law.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I want to say how it shall not be expended.

Mr. RANDALL. How it shall not or how it shall is a change of existing law.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It changes no law. It merely withholds the appropriation, the same as when you fail to appropriate the full amount of an officer's salary, and that is always held to be in order.

Mr. RANDALL. It is an infringement of the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I have the floor, and I differ with the gentleman. I certainly am correct. I simply say no portion of it shall be expended in printing bills of a larger denomination in place of small notes retired or canceled. That is not subject to the point of order. It does not change existing law. I wish to have the attention of the House while the Chair decides, and if he rules that point of order against us I will then attempt to get the opinion of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. This is the case presented in the legislative appropriation bill. We said no money should be expended in reference to the Civil Service Commission except so and so. The gentleman from Georgia decided that was subject to the point of order. Now, this is an amendment which provides this money shall not be expended unless something is done by the Secretary of the Treasury. In my judgment it changes existing law by infringing the discretion under the present statute.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Ah, there is a difference between the cases which the gentleman puts. The civil-service law requires and empowers the Civil Service Commission to make the rules and regulations for that service subject to the approval of the President. But there is no law here requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to retire small notes, one and two dollar greenback notes, and issue in their place notes of a larger denomination. There is no law requiring any such thing, and that is the difference between the two cases.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit we should now have a ruling by the Chair.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Excuse me. The most that can be contended for by the gentleman is that there is a discretion lodged in the Secretary of the Treasury to take up small notes and issue large bills therefor. But there is no violation of that discretion if Congress merely withholds the appropriation for the printing of large bills.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit, with great respect to the gentleman from Iowa, that the committee has already decided the question in reference to the provision there should not be any appropriation for the Civil Service Commission unless they should do so and so.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But that is not this case.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman says no money shall be appropriated unless the ones and twos are issued.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I beg pardon. This does not require the Secretary to do anything. The provision in the legislative bill required him to do something, which was a change of law. It required him to do an affirmative act. This takes from him the appropriation and leaves him quiet.

Mr. RANDALL. Your amendment says they shall not do it unless they do it in a particular way.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No; this amendment does not, as just stated, require him to do anything.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. In relation to the Civil Service Commission it was held it was not competent to place an amendment on the bill which compelled that commission to change two of its rules. The present case has this for its basis: The law prescribes the Secretary of the Treasury may issue notes of various denominations, but does not advise the proportion of the denominations in which they shall be issued. Now, it is proposed by the amendment to say in issuing these notes the Secretary of the Treasury shall not issue large notes in lieu of small notes.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No; it merely provides that no part of the appropriation shall be used to change the denomination of the bills.

The CHAIRMAN. Shall not issue in that proportion in payment. That he shall not issue larger notes in lieu of small notes. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken, and rules the amendment to be in order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A word upon this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have a vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. By the act of 1878, to which reference has already been made, it is provided that—

> When any of said notes may be redeemed, or be received into the Treasury under any law, or from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again, and kept in circulation.

In connection with this provision of law I desire to call the attention of the committee to the letter which has been read by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to that committee, in which he uses this language:

> It is not the policy of the present officers of the Treasury Department to issue one and two dollar notes. No more of such notes will be printed while this policy continues.

It is, he says, "not the policy of the Treasury Department to issue one and two dollar notes." The law says that all United States notes when received into the Treasury shall be reissued, and when mutilated and destroyed that other notes of like denomination shall be issued in their place. That is the law plain and clear. I can but regret that any Treasury official should see fit to send such a letter as this to this House or to a committee of the House. It is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury and of all the officers of the Treasury to carry out the law exactly as they find it upon the statute-book.

Mr. RANDALL. That is just what they are doing.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And notice such as this, that the Treasury Department has adopted a policy in contravention of the law, which it will adhere to, is, to say the least, a most remarkable declaration to be sent to a leading committee of this House.

Is this not a proper subject for inquiry? It certainly may become so. There has been altogether too much "policy" for many years in the administration of the affairs of the Treasury Department and too little regard for the plain provisions of law. I had supposed that Congress determined the policy of the Government when it enacted a law, and that it was the duty of the officers of the Government to carry out the law.

The Treasury is not a bank, to be managed according to a "policy" to be prescribed by its appointed officers, but the Treasury of the United States is to be managed according to the laws enacted by Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. In opposition to that, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say simply that the policy of the administration is in obedience to the law, and I ask a vote.

Mr. DANIEL. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question to see if I correctly understand this matter. I would like to know where, in this statute, which forbids the further retirement of the United States legal-tender notes, there is any vesting of any discretion whatsoever in the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue other notes than those which are received, or new notes of the same denomination, in lieu of them? Where, in any statute, is that discretion?

Mr. RANDALL. He is not prohibited. The gentleman has the statute before him, and if he will look at it it is plain.

Mr. RYAN. Here is the language of the law, if the gentleman will permit me:

Provided, That nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead, as now provided by law.

Mr. RANDALL. That proviso, as the gentleman will see, is that nothing herein shall prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from doing that.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But if reissued they must be in notes of the same denomination, and to issue them in different denominations would be as much a violation of the law as for him to say he would collect a lower scale of duties.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask a vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let the amendment be reported again, so that the committee will clearly understand it.

The amendment was again read.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 65, noes 59.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 79.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. I am under obligation to move that the committee rise at this time to enable the gentleman from Tennessee to submit a resolution.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. All right. The question on the amendment is pending and the vote will be taken in a full House.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. REAGAN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate requested the return to that body of the bill (H. R. 1341) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Natchez, Miss., and the bill (S. 2292) to provide for the settlement of a certain Cherokee claim under the treaty of February 14, 1883.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office; and

A bill (H. R. 7650) to remove the political disabilities of I. G. Flournoy, of Mississippi.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 925) to grant Dearborn Park, in the city of Chicago, to said city for the use and benefit of public and benevolent institutions; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments a resolution of the House for printing the report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, asked a conference with the House on the amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. MANDERSON, and Mr. GORMAN.

DAMAGES BY THE MISSISSIPPI AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit a joint resolution, and ask its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read subject to objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the lower portion of the city of Memphis, Tenn., has in part been destroyed by the caving of the bank of the Mississippi River at that point; and

Whereas great destruction of private property has been entailed and destruction of the property of the United States threatened thereby; and

Whereas Congress has failed to protect said property by the appropriation of money for that purpose; and

Whereas the citizens of said city have subscribed money sufficient for said purpose: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That all or enough of the barges, boats, tools, implements, and appliances now at said city, under the control, custody, or management of the Mississippi River Commission, and used by said commission for the improvement of the Mississippi River at said city, are hereby loaned to the properly authorized officers of the taxing district of Shelby County, Tennessee, to be used by them in improving said river at said city below Beale street thereof; said loan to be made under such regulations as may be made by the Secretary of War for the proper use, safe-keeping, and the return of the same to the proper officers of the United States, and for the payment of all damages which may result to the United States by virtue of such use.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I simply want to enter my objection to the use of Government property for the purpose indicated.

Mr. WILLIS. It is the very work the Government is engaged in at Memphis.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have no desire, however, to object to the consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 190) was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TUCKER. I desire to call up a Senate bill that came over with a slight verbal amendment.

The SPEAKER. Where is it?

Mr. TUCKER. On the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the bill to which the gentleman refers is in the Clerk's room; it has not yet been laid before the House.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 22, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when; on motion of Mr. BUTLER and by unanimous consent, its further reading was dispensed with.

BONDED EXPORT WHISKY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of June 8, 1886, certain information in regard to the authority upon which the orders of January 6, 1885, and March 27, 1886, relating to the exportation and reimportation of distilled spirits, were issued, &c.

The Secretary proceeded to read the communication.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask unanimous consent that the document be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES. The information was called for by a resolution submitted by myself. I think the communication might lie on the table and be printed as a document. We can then determine what use it will be proper to make of it after we see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is usual to print reports of heads of Departments in the RECORD, and it will be also printed as a document.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection, of course. Perhaps it had better lie on the table without reference for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

The communication was ordered to be printed, and printed in the RECORD, and to lie on the table, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 22, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the resolution passed by the Senate June 8, 1886, calling on the Secretary "to furnish to the Senate the authority upon which" the Secretary issued the "orders" of January 6, 1885, and March 27, 1886, relating to the exportation and reimportation of distilled spirits, "together with all decisions of the Attorney-General, opinions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, correspondence, and all other papers relating to" said orders; and to inform the Senate what quantity has been exported under the order of January 6, 1885, on what quantity the tax was paid under that order, what quantity of that exported has been returned to the United States under the order of March 27, 1886, at what ports of entry it was admitted and received, and where it is now stored in bond.

In reply, I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of the documents called for, respectfully referring to the opinion of the Attorney-General of December 23, 1884 (see document No. 6 inclosed), as being the authority "in deference" to which circular No. 282, approved by the Secretary January 6, 1885, was issued. (See document No. 8.)

In regard to the disposition of the 7,750,696 gallons of spirits in distillery warehouses June 30, 1885, which had been stamped and bonded for export under said circular No. 282, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue reports to me, under date of the 11th instant, as follows:

	Gallons.
Exported under said bonds	1,410,356
Withdrawn on payment of tax	6,337,331
Claimed as lost by leakage	3,009
Total	7,750,696

Reports from collectors of customs show the quantity of domestic spirits reimported and entered for warehouse since March 27, 1886, and the quantity of such spirits remaining in customs warehouses, to be as follows, in taxable gallons:

Ports.	Entered.	Remaining in warehouse.
New York	124,696	92,097
Boston	928	928
Philadelphia	55,938	52,895
Baltimore	34,266	27,914
Cincinnati	17,981	13,661
Saint Louis	1,758	1,581
Total	235,567	189,076

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Acting Secretary.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

SUSPENSION OF PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 7th instant, certain information in regard to the issuance by the Commissioner of the General Land Office of a circular suspending applications for the entry of lands under the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws from June 2, 1886, to August 1, 1886.

The Secretary proceeded to read the communication.

Mr. INGALLS. It is unnecessary to read anything more than the letter of transmission. I ask that the letter and the accompanying documents be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of transmission has not been read. If there be no objection the reading will be dispensed with, and it will be printed in the RECORD, and be printed also as a document, with the accompanying documents. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made. Does the Senator move to refer it?

Mr. INGALLS. I will not ask that, as the matter would probably go to the Committee on Public Lands, of which my colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is chairman, and he is not in his seat. Let it lie on the table until he comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table for the present.

The communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, June 21, 1886.

SIR: On the 7th instant I was duly notified of the adoption by the Senate of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the Commissioner of the General Land Office has, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, issued a circular in the following words:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., June 2, 1886.

"To the registers and receivers, United States Land Offices:

"GENTLEMEN: The repeal of the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws being now the subject of consideration by Congress, all applications to enter lands under said laws are hereby suspended from and after this date until the 1st day of August, 1886, and you are hereby directed to receive no filings or new applications for entry under said laws during said time.

"WM. A. J. SPARKS, Commissioner.

"Approved:

"L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary."

Said resolution was immediately referred by me to the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office, with a request for a report thereon, and on the 18th instant the Commissioner submitted the accompanying report, which is herewith forwarded for your consideration.

Shortly after the promulgation of said circular a grave doubt arose in my mind as to the existence of sufficient legal authority in the Department for such suspension of either the pre-emption, timber-culture, or desert-land laws as was contemplated in the aforesaid circular of June 2. Thereupon, after consultation with the Commissioner, an order was promulgated, with my approval, revoking said circular of June 2, which said order of revocation is as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., June 4, 1886.

"To registers and receivers, United States Land Offices:

"GENTLEMEN: Based upon satisfactory evidence that an unusual number of entries under the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws are at this time being made, anticipating the action of Congress repealing said laws, and following numerous precedents of this office and Department deemed to be in substantial harmony therewith, the following order, approved by the Secretary, was on the 2d instant issued to you:

"'The repeal of the pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws being now the subject of consideration by Congress, all applications to enter lands under said laws are hereby suspended from and after this date until the 1st day of August, 1886, and you are hereby directed to receive no filings or new applications for entry under said laws during said time.'

"Now, in view of serious question as to the existence of sufficient absolute legal authority therefor the same is hereby revoked.

"WILLIAM A. J. SPARKS, Commissioner.

"Approved:

"L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary."

Very respectfully,

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of James A. Swift and 13 other second lieutenants of the Signal Corps, praying that Congress extend to them the same privileges and opportunities for promotion to which the officers of the Engineer Corps and the Ordnance Department are now entitled under law; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY. I present a memorial of citizens of Corpus Christi, Tex., remonstrating against the removal of the custom-house at that place to Laredo. Mr. GRAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 31) for the relief of Warren Mitchell, to report it favorably without amendment, with a majority and minority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report and the views of the minority will be printed, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

A bill (S. 2424) granting an increase of pension to George W. Kincaid;

A bill (S. 2487) granting a pension to Andrew Mucklin; and

A bill (S. 2488) granting a pension to John B. Fuller.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1562) granting arrears of pension to A. C. Hight, reported it adversely, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD BRANCHES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to state with reference to a report made from the Judiciary Committee yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], being the bill (S. 2395) to authorize and empower the Union Pacific Railroad to construct branch roads, which he reported favorably, that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] and myself do not concur in that report.

NICARAGUAN CLAIMS CONVENTION.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Select Committee to Inquire into all Claims of Citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, reported it without amendment:

Whereas the following resolution was passed in the Senate on March 10, 1882, and in the House of Representatives on the 16th March, 1882:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to bring to the attention of the Government of Nicaragua the necessity of arranging by a convention for final settlement of all unadjusted claims existing between the Government of the United States and the Government of Nicaragua and claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua."

And whereas no information has been given to Congress of any practical progress that has been made in the adjustment of the claims of the citizens of the United States against the Republic of Nicaragua:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to bring this subject to the attention of the Government of Nicaragua, with a view to securing the prompt and full satisfaction of the just claims of the citizens of the United States against the Government of Nicaragua.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the resolution be considered at the present time.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

INTERMENT IN NEW BERNE NATIONAL CEMETERY.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7364) authorizing the Secretary of War to allow the interment in the national cemetery at New Berne, in the State of North Carolina, of the remains of the late Mrs. Harriet B. Lehman, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask for the present consideration of the bill. It merely gives permission to bury the widow of a soldier in the cemetery by his side, and the War Department say there is no objection.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 2721) to remove the disabilities of John K. Mitchell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GEORGE. The petition in this case has already been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 2726) to increase the pension of Agnes Allison; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present an amendment which I desire to propose to the sundry civil appropriation bill. I desire to accompany it with a brief statement of facts in regard to the subject of the amendment; which I ask may be printed, and, with the amendment, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2457) for the relief of the State of Georgia; which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RAILROAD RECEIVERS.

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the powers of receivers appointed by United States courts for insolvent railroad companies, either with or without instructions from the courts appointing them, to disregard the laws of the States in which said railroads are operated in relation to the regulations of fares and freights, and also to inquire whether any legislation is needed in reference to this subject; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

DEMONETIZATION OF COIN.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to call up, merely for the purpose of reference, the bill (S. 1194) to prevent demonetizing American coin by certain persons in the United States, which has been long upon the President's table. I ask to have it referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance. The Chair hears no objection.

RAILROAD ATTORNEYS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to call up my motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 2578) to prohibit members of Congress from acting as attorneys or employés for railroad companies holding charters or having received grant of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States.

Mr. BECK. I am glad the Senator has called up the motion. I was rising for the same purpose.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator, before he calls that up, allow me to ask unanimous consent to take a bill from the Calendar which will not interfere with it?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion to reconsider, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill on the Calendar.

Mr. DAWES. Laying aside the bill called up by the Senator from Connecticut informally.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not understand that the Senate has determined to proceed to the consideration of the measure suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. He simply made a proposition to call it up.

Mr. HAWLEY. I yielded the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts to make some proposition, understanding that he desires to leave town. I will defer the matter for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Until the motion is put and carried it will not be in order for the Senator from Connecticut, even by unanimous consent, to interpose.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have an understanding about the matter.

Mr. DAWES. I hope after a statement there will be no objection to my request.

Mr. BUTLER. I intended to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad bill, which was under discussion yesterday in the morning hour, and I have not consented to take up the motion to reconsider suggested by the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut is in order in moving to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be done by a majority of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not the slightest objection to the Senator from Massachusetts proceeding with the matter he has in charge.

Mr. DAWES. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator's measure.

Mr. HAWLEY. I yielded the floor for the moment to the Senator from Massachusetts, who desires to leave town.

Mr. BECK. I rose to make the same motion as the Senator from Connecticut. I understand that was the first motion made, and now I ask the Senate to vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the first motion; but the Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a bill.

Mr. BECK. I object. I do not know what it is.

Mr. INGALLS. May we understand what is the motion now pending?

Mr. HAWLEY. I moved to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2578. Upon the passage of that bill I entered a motion to reconsider.

Mr. INGALLS. Then the question is not upon the bill, but upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HAWLEY. The question is upon the pending motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the question before the Senate when that bill is taken up. The bill must be taken up in order to present that question. The pending question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate. The question now is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DAWES. Now I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be informally laid aside so that I may ask the Senate to take up a bill under peculiar circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Connecticut desires the consideration of the bill that he has moved I hope he will proceed under the direction of the Senate, and if he does not, I hope he will withdraw his application and let something else be done.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am quite ready to proceed, but the Senator from Massachusetts makes a personal appeal to me. He desires to leave town, and has some matter which he asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider. I do not know what it is, but it is the usual courtesy of the Senate, and I yielded the floor for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I wanted to ask the passage of a bill on the Calendar, as I am going away.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a bill, which will be read for information, and then the Chair will ask for objections.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let us hear what the bill is.

Mr. BECK. The present measure is to be informally laid aside, I understand.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2661) touching the grade of commander in the Navy, and to correct an error in relation to an appointment therein.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAWES. I will state with the indulgence of the Senate why I ask to have the bill considered now.

On the last day when the Calendar was before the Senate I was engaged in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, and the Senator from Illinois when this bill was reached kindly asked that it might be passed over because of my absence. It is necessary for me to be absent from the Senate and the city for two or three days, and that is the reason why, as the Calendar will be considered again in my absence, I should like to have this matter considered now. The bill has passed the Senate unanimously once, and I think the present shape of the bill will meet every one's sanction if it is only understood what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the bill will be read.

The bill was read, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. DAWES. There is a report.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not exactly catch the point in the bill with regard to the retirement of that officer. As I caught the reading it provided for his retirement as a commander with the highest rank in that grade.

Mr. DAWES. The highest pay on the retired-list.

Mr. BUTLER. The highest pay on the retired-list of commander. My understanding of the matter in committee was that he should be placed upon the retired-list with the rank he held when dismissed from the service. I think it had better be modified. That would put him away up.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out the words "with the highest retired-pay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report has been called for.

Mr. DAWES. The report will show. He was tried when he was a commander.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that, but the bill provides for the highest pay of commander. I am very willing that the bill should pass so as to retire him with the pay of commander as of the rank he held when dismissed.

Mr. DAWES. There are different grades of pay between sea-service and shore-service and all that; but I did not suppose that there were different grades of pay of commanders when on duty.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to strike out the words "with the highest retired-pay."

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator will understand that there is longevity pay also in the grade of commander. The highest rate would be sea-pay.

Mr. DAWES. He is to have the highest pay of a commander on the retired-list.

Mr. McPHERSON. They are retired as a matter of course as they go from the active-list. It would depend altogether on how much longevity pay he received.

Mr. DAWES. I am willing to strike that out.

Mr. McPHERSON. The longevity-pay extends also to the retired-list, and so does the sea-pay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. DAWES. I am willing to amend the bill in that respect.

Mr. INGALLS. Can we not have the report read, so that we may understand what is the meaning of these motions to amend? If this is to be decided by two or three members of the Senate without any further consideration, I am content; but I should like to get at the facts of the case so as to vote understandingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAWES June 14, 1886:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 962) touching the grade of commander in the Navy, and to correct an error in relation to an appointment therein, beg leave to submit the following report:

The bill was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs on January 8, 1886. After giving it consideration the committee instructed one of their members to report the bill adversely, which was done on May 5, 1886. Some members of the committee not being present when the adverse report was ordered to be made, and desiring to give the bill further consideration in the committee, it was recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs on May 20, 1886.

After full consideration of all the facts and circumstances bearing upon this case your committee now report the bill to the Senate, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The bill, as introduced, proposed to authorize the appointment by the President of a commander in the Navy, to take rank and position as of the time of the suspension of John M. Quackenbush, namely, June 9, 1874, or, as will be seen from the preamble, the object of the bill is to restore Quackenbush to his original position in the Navy.

The substitute proposed by your committee authorizes the President to appoint said Quackenbush a commander in the Navy, and place him on the retired-list as such with the highest retired-pay of that grade, from the date of his appointment, and further provides that the money paid him from date of suspension, June 9, 1874, until April 1, 1881, shall not be required to be restored to the United States, as it appears that no question as to his status as a naval officer was ever raised until the latter date.

The history of this case is very fully given in a report made to the Senate on March 6, 1884, by Mr. Jones, of Florida, on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Forty-eighth Congress, which is hereunto appended and made a part of this report. Your committee therefore report back the bill in a new form and recommend its passage as reported.

John N. Quackenbush was, upon the 25th day of May, 1871, duly appointed and commissioned by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commander in the Navy of the United States, in regular course of promotion from the rank of lieutenant-commander. He was tried by a naval court-martial in February, 1874, and sentenced to dismissal. The record shows that this sentence was approved by the President on the 5th day of June, 1874.

On the 9th day of June, 1874, the Secretary of the Navy addressed a letter to Commander Quackenbush, at Boston, informing him of the sentence of the court-martial and of its approval by the President, and stating that from that date (9th June) he would "cease to be an officer in the Navy."

On 12th June, 1874, the Secretary of the Navy again addressed a letter to Commander Quackenbush, at Boston, asking him to return the order dismissing him from the Navy; and the latter returned the order to the Secretary of the Navy, under cover of a letter of the 15th of June, 1874.

On the 8th day of December, 1874, the Secretary of the Navy again addressed a letter to Commander Quackenbush, at Boston, stating that the sentence of the court-martial was, on the 9th day of June, 1874, mitigated to suspension from rank and duty, on furlough-pay, for six years, the suspension to date from that day. And the Fourth Auditor was so notified the same day.

On the 10th day of June, 1874, the President nominated to the Senate W. S. Schley to be commander in the Navy, "vice Quackenbush, dismissed," which nomination was confirmed by the Senate on the 12th day of June, 1874.

It appears that this nomination was inadvertently made "vice Quackenbush, dismissed," as there had been no intention on the part of the President to dismiss Quackenbush. A retention of both Schley and Quackenbush upon the list made an excess of one over the legal number of commanders. The Secretary of the Navy, as soon as this fact was called to his attention, directed that no nomination should be made to the next succeeding vacancy; which recommendation was complied with, no appointment being then made, or having subsequently been made, to the position made vacant by the retirement of George W. Morris, the only result of the error having been that Schley received his promotion a few weeks earlier than would otherwise have been the case.

The President referred the matter to the Attorney-General for an opinion. The Attorney-General rendered his opinion on the 16th day of March, 1878 (15 Op., 465), in which he says:

"Presuming that the first branch of your inquiry—that part of it relating to the admissibility of 'parol proof' that the President assented to the mitigation of the sentence on the 9th of June—is propounded with reference solely to the admissibility of the letter of the Secretary of the Navy of the 8th of December as evidence of the fact just mentioned, I submit that this letter can not be properly viewed in the light of mere parol evidence of such fact. It is an official document, pertaining to a matter which necessarily came within the official observation of the Secretary, and, regarded simply as such, is entitled to be received as at least prima facie proof of what is therein stated touching that matter; but being, moreover, an act which, in contemplation of law, proceeds from the President himself, it must be deemed to be evidence of the very highest order of the particular fact above referred to. The directions of the President respecting the mitigation of a court-martial sentence may be, and frequently are, given ore tenus, and left to be formally made known and carried out through the head of the appropriate Department. When this is the case, the orders or instructions of the latter issued in discharge of that duty constitute primary and perhaps conclusive evidence of what the directions of the President were.

"Agreeably to these views, the letter of the Secretary of the Navy of the 8th of December must be considered satisfactory proof not only of the mitigation of the sentence by the President, but that it was mitigated by him on the 9th day of June, the time stated in the letter—supposing, of course, that the power to mitigate might then have been exerted by the President.

"This nomination following so closely on the letter of dismissal, written by the Secretary of the Navy, is apparently inconsistent with the subsequent statement by him that the sentence was mitigated by him at the time mentioned. It assumes, indeed, the complete execution of the sentence—that the officer was thereby dismissed, and is an official act based on this assumption. But it did not of itself affect or change the previous or then existing status of such officer. Thus had the nomination been made after the approval of the sentence of dismissal, but before anything was done in execution thereof, it could hardly be considered as constituting a sufficient execution of that sentence.

"So the confirmation of the nomination, and the issue of a commission thereupon, did not necessarily produce any alteration of the status of the officer under sentence. * * * It may be that the 'vice' in the nomination was made by inadvertence, and, in view of the statement just adverted to, it can not be regarded otherwise than as thus originating."

Following this advice of the Attorney-General, Commander Quackenbush has served out his probation under order of the President, the duration of which expired on the 9th day of June, 1880, at which time he was restored to waiting-orders pay, under which he now is. The recent decision and judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Charles M. Blake vs. The United States (13 Otto, 227) makes questionable the right of the said Quackenbush to hold said office, not by reason of the order of dismissal, first erroneously promulgated and immediately afterward withdrawn, because, according to the opinion of the Attorney-General, the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, on the 8th day of December, in which it is stated that the President had assented to the mitigation of the sentence on the 9th day of June, is accepted as evidence of the highest order of the fact referred to therein; but, by reason of the fact that the nomination of W. S. Schley to be commander was made "vice Quackenbush, dismissed," which, if given its full force as a bona fide act of the President, taken in connection with the subsequent confirmation of the same by the Senate, according to the decision of the Supreme Court operates to supersede Quackenbush, who thereupon ceased to be an officer of the Navy.

With respect to the making of the nomination of W. S. Schley in the manner it was, Hon. George M. Robeson, in a letter to the President dated February 16, 1882, says:

"The nomination of Schley 'vice Quackenbush' went through in some incomprehensible manner, and when brought to my attention, as it made an excess of numbers, I ordered no nomination to be made for the position shortly after vacated by the retirement of Morris, which reduced the number of commanders to the legal limits."

It will be remembered that Mr. Robeson was Secretary of the Navy at the time the matters mentioned in his letter took place.

General Grant, in a letter to the President dated February 10, 1882, says:

"The case of Commander J. N. Quackenbush, United States Navy, sentenced to be dismissed in 1874, has just been called to my attention, with the hardship attending his case, by reason of inadvertency in sending in the nomination of his successor after his sentence had been commuted. The matter of nominations or promotions in the Army and Navy is regulated by law, so that the Executive scarcely thinks to look at the nominations when put before him, supposing, of course, they are to fill vacancies. In this way it seems Commander Quackenbush was suspended, and now finds himself in danger of being out of the Navy by reason of the recent decision in another case. I remember the case of Commander Quackenbush, but not the details of my action. I have no doubt, however, that Hon. George M. Robeson, then Secretary of the Navy, knows and remembers all about it. I do know, however, the intention was not to put him out of the service, and I now recommend his nomination to the vacancy which was kept open for him from the time of the first vacancy after the promotion of Schley.

"The fact that executive action was delayed so long in the case of Commander Quackenbush, at the request of Samuel Howe, shows quite conclusively that the approval of the sentence and mitigation was done at one and the same time. My decision was probably given verbally to the Secretary, and a mistake in the record has been made by a clerk."

With respect to the latter question, Mr. Robeson, in the letter already quoted from, says:

"The action of approval and of mitigation was at one and the same time, whatever the records in the Department may appear to show. The direction to me being verbal, and a letter being sent at once by me to Commander Quackenbush, and afterward, in December, the letter promulgating the finding and mitigation, I may have rested content with my action, and neglected to order or to make full indorsement of the records."

It is highly probable that the draught of the formal approval of the sentence of dismissal, which appears upon the record of the court-martial in the handwriting of some one else other than the President, was made on the 5th day of June, but was not actually signed by the President till on the 9th day of June.

The bill under consideration authorizes the President to nominate and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint the said John N. Quackenbush commander in the United States Navy, vice George U. Morris, retired, to take rank and position on the list of such commanders from and after the date of the retirement of Morris, namely, October 21, 1874, and next after the name of Commander W. P. Sampson; the appointment to be to fill the vacancy still unfilled, caused by the retirement of Morris, the right to fill which is unquestioned under the above decision, and the right to reissue the original commission of Commander Quackenbush might be questionable, with the provision that such appointment shall not entitle the said John N. Quackenbush to compensation during the time that intervened between the appointment of Schley and the subsequent retirement of Morris; and with the further provision that after such reappointment the said John N. Quackenbush shall be entitled (with the exception provided above, namely, that no compensation shall be received for the few months that intervened between the issuing of the commission to Schley and the retirement of Morris) to compensation from the date of his original commission to the present time, as by him duly received up to the time of the raising of the question as to his status, in consequence of the Supreme Court decision in the case of Blake above referred to; and he having been all this time borne on the rolls of the Navy, and on waiting orders, he shall receive whatever arrears of salary have accrued since the 1st day of April, 1881, that being the day on which further payment of his salary was deferred until his status should be finally decided.

There appears to be no doubt of the fact that it was not the intention of the President to dismiss Commander Quackenbush from the Navy, either by the approval of the sentence of the court-martial or the nomination of Schley to be commander. Quackenbush has, as before stated, served out his probation under the order of the President, and it would be a hardship for him now not to be retained in the Navy. The committee therefore report the bill back with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. INGALLS. The report which has just been read does not disclose the reasons why this man was dismissed by court-martial from the naval service of the United States. It carefully avoids any expression of opinion on that subject, or any statement of the evidence which was before the court-martial by whom he was tried.

My object in calling for the reading of the report was to ascertain if possible upon what evidence the court-martial acted; and I have been endeavoring to ascertain by inquiry from those who are advised, and I learn from the facts which have been stated to me that the suppression of the truth in the report is at least something for which the proposed beneficiary of this bill has devout reason to be thankful. If I am correctly advised, he was tried by court-martial for being drunk on duty at a foreign station, on shipboard, in the presence of his men, and that in a foreign country in that condition he visited disreputable places of resort, and in every way in which it could be done disgraced the uniform and the flag of his country.

He was sentenced to be dismissed from the service, and by the same appliances which have been used in his behalf since that time the sentence of dismissal was mitigated by the President of the United States to suspension for the term of six years, and he was subsequently ordered to active service and continued for two years in that capacity. Now, this bill proposes to place him on the retired-list and practically give him a pension amounting, I suppose, to about $1,500 a year, and thereby put him in a position in the same category with those who have acted in compliance with their orders and the rules and regulations of the service.

Mr. President, action like that invoked by this bill is destructive of discipline, of the morale of the service. I have said upon more than one occasion on this floor that no man who wears the uniform of the United States, either as a military or naval officer, who is once dismissed after fair trial for drunkenness upon duty ever ought to be restored. It is a disgraceful implication upon the service that this should be done, and the methods which have been resorted to, which I do not wish to characterize here, for the purpose of bringing influences to bear in order to place this man back in position and give him this money, to which he is not entitled, are such as ought not to be employed.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator from Kansas will bear with me a moment, I wish to know after the sentence of the court-martial was approved by the President how it could have been mitigated?

Mr. INGALLS. I was informed upon inquiry, or supposed I was informed, that the sentence of the court-martial was that he should be dishonorably dismissed from the service. I think the Senator from South Carolina can say whether that is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. That is correct.

Mr. INGALLS. Now the Senator from New Jersey inquires how that could have been modified.

Mr. BUTLER. It was modified in this way: The sentence was mitigated by President Grant to six years' suspension from the service.

Mr. INGALLS. Without pay.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not remember, but perhaps on furlough-pay; but in the mean time the present Commodore Schley was appointed to take the place made vacant by the dismissal of Commander Quackenbush. That in law operated as an ejection from the service, and this bill was originally intended to correct that mistake. There is no doubt about the fact that a mistake was made. The Secretary of the Navy admitted it.

Mr. INGALLS. What was the practical result of the mistake?

Mr. BUTLER. The practical result was that the nomination and confirmation of Commander Schley put Quackenbush out of the service.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Massachusetts informs me that I am mistaken in saying that after his dismissal he served but two years. He informs me that it was six.

Mr. President, I do not know the proposed beneficiary of this bill, and it is unnecessary for me to say that I speak absolutely without any personal feeling whatever; but if the facts are as stated to me, if they are as stated by those who defend this bill, I can not understand upon what reason, upon what basis of justice, upon what sentiment that will sustain the honor of the naval service, the Senate can vote to put this man on the retired-list and thereby remove every stigma that has been affixed to him, and declare practically that he is on the same footing and in the same category with those who have served honorably and efficiently under the flag of their country.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a very proper and pertinent inquiry made by the Senator from Kansas; and I want to state in justification of my own conduct that the bill as it first came to the Committee on Naval Affairs proposed to restore this officer, Commander Quackenbush, to the rank that he held when he was dismissed. The practical effect of that would have been to put him above the present Commodore Schley, who distinguished himself in the command of the expedition for the relief of Greely and his companions. I could not consent to that. I could not consent that an officer who had, as the Senator from Kansas has stated, disgraced himself by drunkenness with his uniform on should ever be restored to the active-list of the Navy. I think it bad in principle; I think it is dangerous in principle.

We have had a very serious experience within the last four or five years in the sinking of the Ashuelot by a man who had been court-martialed and dismissed for drunkenness. By importunity he was restored, and the result was that while in command of a ship he became intoxicated, the ship was lost, and several lives lost with the going down of the vessel. That is a practical illustration of the danger of restoring an officer to the active-list of the Navy who had been drunk once.

But it was represented to the members of the committee that this officer had a good record during the war; I think perhaps he had distinguished himself; and out of consideration for that fact I yielded my consent to this bill which puts him upon the retired-list of the Navy, as I supposed, with the rank that he held when he was dismissed from the service. It was purely and solely out of consideration to his past record in the Navy that I gave my assent to the bill which is now under consideration.

As the Senator from Kansas has stated, I have not a particle of feeling about this case. I know this officer very slightly; and I agree with the Senator from Kansas that it is a very dangerous precedent, one which ought not to be followed. I am very frank to say that I reluctantly gave my consent to the passage of this bill, which puts him upon the retired-list, without back pay, with the rank that he held when he was dismissed from the service.

Mr. INGALLS. What pay will he receive under this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not really remember now. About $1,500 I am informed.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator indulge me a moment?

Mr. BECK. I was about to rise to say that I thought, when another bill was pending and unanimous consent was asked that a bill that would pass without debate should be taken up, I do not think this bill ought to be pressed now under the circumstances. The debate will last not only until 2 o'clock, but for a good many hours apparently.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to make some reply to the Senator from Kansas. The Senator from Kansas has seen fit to criticise the report which has been submitted to the Senate in language which reflects upon the frankness and sincerity of those who presented that report.

Mr. INGALLS. Pardon me a moment; I referred to the report of the committee at a previous Congress, not the report made now.

Mr. DAWES. I submitted that report to the Senate, and I am responsible for it. I adopted the report made to the last Congress by a distinguished Senator of this body, and I repudiate the charge, made without the slightest foundation, and only growing out of the habit of scolding members of the Senate, that there has been any concealment whatever or any intention of misdirecting the Senate. Sir, every fact necessary for the foundation upon which this bill rests is set out in the report, and it is based solely on the fact that this officer was displaced from the Navy upon a mistake of the Navy Department; and that is recited in full. That mistake had no relation to the cause for which he was originally tried by court-martial.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it is due to the committee, and also due to Mr. Quackenbush, that the Senator from Massachusetts should state what I forgot to state, that for the last twelve years his conduct has been absolutely blameless, as I am told.

Mr. DAWES. I was going to state that. Here was a commander in the Navy who had distinguished himself by honorable service in the Navy. He was overtaken in a foreign port with drunkenness and behaved in a manner unbecoming his position. He was tried by court-martial. It was the first and only charge of the kind ever made against him. It was of such a gross character that the court-martial felt compelled to pass the severe sentence upon him that they did of dismissal from the service. Nobody complains of that. But when it was brought to the consideration of President Grant, and he heard all the mitigating circumstances connected with the case, and the fact that this man had an honorable and distinguished record, he felt as if it was due to him, and it could be done safely to the Navy, to give him an opportunity to show whether this was a confirmed habit, or whether it was an accidental overcoming of him under circumstances of peculiar temptation to which he most unfortunately yielded, and the President mitigated that sentence. But a few hours before he had approved the sentence, and when the facts came to his knowledge, he recalled his approval. He approved the sentence on the 9th day of the month, and on the 10th he recalled his approval and put the officer on suspension for six years to see what would be the effect upon him. The Navy Department inadvertently on the next day, not having before it at that moment the mitigation of the sentence, nominated another man in place of this man dismissed, and he was confirmed properly enough. That eight or ten years afterward was decided by the Supreme Court to work the dismissal of such a man. But this man went on under his six years' suspension, perfectly sober as he ever was in this world. At the end of the six years he was called back to the service and served in his rank for five or six years more until 1881, when this decision of the Supreme Court came out in another case, which compelled the Navy Department in 1881 to drop him from the rolls, although he had served five or six years in his rank as commander in the Navy under the supposition of everybody that he was an officer in the Navy. Under these circumstances last year the Senate passed unanimously a bill to put him back in his old place.

I agree heartily with the Senator from South Carolina that we should do injustice to a gallant officer of the Navy by putting him above Commodore Schley, and every member of the committee agreed that under all the circumstances the best that could be done for this unfortunate man who has suffered so much by his one act of folly and who has shown by ten or twelve years of rectitude in life that it was not a confirmed habit—the best that could be done, and it was just and right that it should be done, was that he should be put upon the retired-list of the Navy at the point he was when the court-martial took place.

This is the whole of this case. I have not a word to say about the criticism of the Senator from Kansas of men who are habitually addicted to drink who are in the Army or the Navy; but men do sometimes yield to temptation for once and recover from it and are men afterward; and a wise discretion in the superior officer, in the Executive, exerted in such instances, instead of working harm to the service, is an encouragement and a hope held out to men who have thus yielded in a single instance that it is possible for them to recover themselves. Justly and discreetly and properly administered, there is no principle governing the control of the Army and the Navy which in my opinion would be more healthy than that. It is on that ground that this bill is here in its present shape. I think the word "highest" should be stricken out. It was inserted by me not knowing these different grades of pay. The intention was to put him right where he was when he was court-martialed.

Mr. HAWLEY. In order that I may vote as I desire to vote on this matter I wish to ask whether this bill attempts to remit or revoke anything of the penalty imposed, or whether it simply places this man where he would have been, having suffered all that punishment, if it had not been for a mistake in promotion?

Mr. HOAR. I have seen myself a letter from President Grant saying that this was a mistake.

Mr. DAWES. It puts him there from the day of his appointment, with a proviso that he shall not pay back the salary of those years when he supposed he was in the Navy and was acting in obedience to the orders of the Navy Department. The proviso is that he shall not pay back that salary. The legal status is that he has served and taken the pay of an officer of the Navy when he was not one, and therefore it might be that he would have to pay back that money.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill neither credits nor takes back anything?

Mr. DAWES. Not a particle.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 8 of the bill it is proposed to strike out the word "highest," before the word "retired-pay;" so as to read:

And place him on the retired-list as such with the retired-pay of that grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I would suggest another verbal amendment in order to make the bill perfectly clear; that is, after the word "appointment," in line 9, to insert "under this act;" so as to read:

With the retired-pay of that grade from the date of such appointment under this act.

Mr. DAWES. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. Is the retired-list full?

Mr. BUTLER. No, it has never been full.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LOGAN. There is no use in opposing bills of this kind in the Senate; but I should like to call the attention of the Senate of the United States to one thing. When any man in the Army or the Navy asks to be put on the retired-list it is agreed to; but I should like to call the attention of Senators to it and ask them to read for their own information the retired-list of the Navy. I do not propose to take up the time by reading it now, but I call attention to the number of retirements in the Navy which have been made by act of Congress. There are that many pages [indicating] of the Navy Register on the retired-list, thirty-nine pages, close print, containing the retired-list, and the Senate will be astonished when they see the number that have been put upon that list by act of Congress, men who have been drunkards and dismissed for every offense known to the laws of the country.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the Navy?

Mr. LOGAN. It is the retired-list of the Navy that I hold up here. As I stated, I merely ask Senators for their own information to read that retired-list and see what the Congress of the United States has been doing for a few years past, and then if they will turn to the Army Register and see what they have done in the Army retired-list they will be astonished at their own acts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I would vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and withhold my vote.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. If not paired, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired on general political questions with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. How my colleague would vote on this question, if present, I do not know. I presume he would have no objection to the Senator from North Carolina voting.

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], but for the purpose of this vote he is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON]. If I were not paired, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VOORHEES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]. I do not know how he would vote, but were he here I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 22, nays 17; as follows:

RAILROAD ATTORNEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill before the Senate will now be read.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (S. 2578) to prohibit members of Congress from acting as attorneys or employés for railroad companies holding charters or having received grants of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] moves to reconsider the vote by which this bill was passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. On the 1st of June the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] offered the bill under consideration, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any member of either House of Congress to accept employment as attorney at law, or payment for services of any kind, from any railroad company, or any officer or agent thereof, which obtained its charter, or any grant of lands, or pecuniary aid from the United States; and any person who violates this provision shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000, and imprisoned not more than one year, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. HAWLEY. That bill was laid upon the table, not referred to a committee, and was called up on the 10th; a reference was refused; and the bill was passed. In the course of the afternoon I read over and considered the bill. It seemed in my judgment to be very harsh and severe. The evil, if there be one, I would acknowledge; I would desire to reach it by some rule of the Senate, or, if necessary, by a statute. The bill attracted no attention as it lay on the table.

It was invisible to the public eye. It attracted no attention. It is to the Calendar that we are accustomed to look for bills that await the action of the Senate. Before bills reach the Calendar they are in a chrysalis state, supposed to be undergoing a careful investigation by a competent committee. Theoretically some thought is given to the evil which is alleged to exist and which the bill is to remedy; also to the existing statutes to see whether they do not sufficiently cover the ground. Thirdly, the provisions of the proposed bill are scanned. Is there a vacuum in legislation? Does the bill fill it? Is the evil known to exist? Are the provisions reasonable? Is the evil a crime—a malum in se?" Or is it of a less degree—some proceeding in contravention of public policy which can be reached by a milder form of prohibition which shall affirm the general sense of the wrong of the conduct in question?

Is the bill such that honorable men, proceeding in entire innocence of improper intent, men of unquestioned integrity and high motives, might unexpectedly find themselves convicted of a felony, beggared by a fine, and forever disgraced by a term in the penitentiary?

This bill was sprung suddenly upon the Senate. It had never been considered by a committee. It was not even debated. It is aimed at conduct which has evidently a range of moral character from entire innocence up to corruption deserving impeachment and expulsion. It contains possibilities of perfect surprise and sudden, final, and irreparable dishonor. Are its provisions well considered? The murderer has the advantage of being charged with guilty knowledge and intent.

This bill takes no knowledge of motive, of intent. Will a court equitably consider and construe it? I hope so. I hope the courts will be wiser than Congress is in the passing of the bill. It was proposed and passed as a resolution of adjournment of Congress might be if a deadly, merciless pestilence had suddenly discovered itself. It is aimed at ourselves—four hundred and one men—four hundred and one only. Its passage is an affirmation that some among us are guilty of practices so heinous, yet up to this moment entirely unknown, that all the wise processes of legislation must be instantly suspended, and the bill passed as one would ring the fire-bell or light the beacon-fires of war.

Had it been some form of swindling, robbery, murder, or treason to which it had been discovered that Congressmen only were addicted, doubtless the Senate would have preserved its dignity and adhered to its wise and conservative rules. But not only was it stampeded through the Senate, but it was affirmed in the only two or three sentences of explanation that "the bill had better be voted down than sent to the Judiciary Committee." The disrespect to the leading committee that committee can take care of. The reflection upon the Senate, for myself, I disclaim and resent.

But the Senator from Kentucky went further. He declared that "a reference to any committee amounts to a defeat of the bill." Has not the Senate command over its committees? Can it not instruct them? Can it not relieve a committee from the charge of a bill and take up the measure in full Senate at any hour of any day?

The Senator from Kentucky affirms that corrupt and dishonorable conduct has so strong a hold upon the Senate that not only the committee highest in rank but the majority of this body will resort to disreputable evasions to escape a high duty and protect a felony, and the only safety for the public honor is to suspend all the machinery of legislation and rush the bill through by an instant vote without an instant of deliberation, lest the low tone of public morals here prevalent may defeat justice.

This bill as it stands gives sanction to a cheap, common, and nasty defamation of Congress, which is untrue, and brings the Government into discredit. It can be abused. How, those familiar with the practice of criminal law can tell better than I; but a man is liable to be sent to the penitentiary if he receives payment for service of any kind, the collection of an ordinary debt if you choose, or the settlement of a question concerning a trespass upon land, from any railroad company or from the agent of any company which has been created by a charter from the National Government or which has received a grant of land or has received any aid whatever at any time. I suppose that the Senator from Maine might receive instructions or a request from the Illinois Central Railroad Company to secure a debt in Maine and might do it without reflection upon his honor. It certainly would not be malum in se; and he might have forgotten that thirty or forty years ago that railroad received a land grant.

So of various other railroads that in some way may have received aid, whether to the extent of one dollar or thousands, no matter how long ago. If he accepts payment for service of any kind for such a road, if he becomes in any respect or degree the attorney of the road or of any of its agents, he is liable to go to the penitentiary and pay a heavy fine—not a fine or an imprisonment, but by the statute he is required to suffer both a fine up to $5,000 and imprisonment in the penitentiary up to a year. He is found guilty of felony, a man entirely without dishonorable intent and without dishonorable action.

Sir, I have said very nearly all I care to say upon this bill. I protest against that kind of legislation in a matter of this sort affecting the honor of the Congress of the United States. Such haste is not needed. Such haste is an unworthy reflection upon ourselves. We can afford in that as well as in all other things to stand upon the proper dignity and self-respect of the body and make a reference of the bill to a committee. I resent the imputation that any committee would smother such a bill, or that a majority of the Senate would permit it to be smothered.

I have no railroad stock, no bonds. I never was attorney for a railroad company that I remember, unless it was in some minor matter thirty or more years ago. I have no personal interest in any sense whatever, no prejudices. I was not asked to make this motion. I made it of my own will as a result of my own consideration, because I will not, by such stampeding, assent to the proposition or to the intimation that we are so rotten that we must ring the fire-bell and pass the bill without consideration or reference.

That is all I have to say, sir.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, all the suggestions of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that anybody was stampeded, or that any one was sought to be insulted, or that there was any effort made to reflect upon any member of either House of Congress, are altogether gratuitous. I had no such intention. The bill declares and embraces no such purpose. Nor was there any haste in its presentation. It was printed June 2, and laid upon the tables of Senators from that day till the 10th, and was called up after due notice given. I announced when it was called up that I had nothing to say about it unless other Senators wanted to discuss it, because its provisions were plain and obvious. A motion was made to refer it. The yeas and nays were called upon the question of reference, and the Senate refused to refer it to any committee. The bill is not over ten lines long, and it was obvious that no committee could give any further information about it than it shows upon its face. It submitted the simple proposition, shall members of either House of Congress be allowed hereafter to act as attorneys for land-grant railroads or railroads that have charters or subsidies from the United States? That was fairly presented to the Senate; every Senator had a right to debate it. No one desired to; and upon a call of the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill it was passed by a vote of 37 yeas to 11 nays. Therefore it is absurd to complain of my action. If gentlemen now desire to reconsider what they have deliberately done, that is their business; but to suggest that this is bad legislation, or that it is out of the line of past legislation, or that such limitations on the action of members of Congress have not been imposed time and again, is not warranted by the facts.

Turn to the Revised Statutes. Section 1058 provides that—

Members of either House of Congress shall not practice in the Court of Claims.

There is a distinct and important limitation upon the right of members of Congress to practice law in the court where the interest of the United States may be involved.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask what is the penalty in that case? The Senator has the statute.

Mr. BECK. I have read the whole provision.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is no penitentiary penalty and no heavy fine.

Mr. BECK. There are penalties attached to all violations of law. What they are under the particular law I will not stop to inquire, as I have not examined, but I will read another section of the Revised Statutes, and then the Senator perhaps will ask the same question.

Every member of Congress or any officer or agent of the Government who, directly or indirectly, takes, receives, or agrees to receive, any money, property, or other valuable consideration whatever, from any person for procuring, or aiding to procure, any contract, office, or place, from the Government or any Department thereof, or from any officer of the United States, for any person whatever, or for giving any such contract, office, or place to any person whomsoever, and every person who, directly or indirectly, offers or agrees to give, or gives, or bestows any money, property, or other valuable consideration whatever, for the procuring or aiding to procure any such contract, office, or place, and every member of Congress who, directly or indirectly, takes, receives, or agrees to receive any money, property, or other valuable consideration whatever after his election as such member, for his attention to, services, action, vote, or decision on any question, matter, cause, or proceeding which may then be pending, or may by law or under the Constitution be brought before him in his official capacity, or in his place as such member of Congress, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

That section applies to members from the time of their election to Congress who shall take a fee for giving any attention to any business that may legitimately come before them while they are members of either House of Congress. And the Senator from Connecticut will observe:

Such member of Congress so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not more than two years and fined not more than $10,000.

Double the amount that I provide. I hope Senators will read carefully section 1781 of the Revised Statutes and they will see that I propose no new or untried principle.

Mr. HOAR. What is the offense?

Mr. BECK. The offense is where any member of Congress receives or agrees to receive money for his attention to, or service, among a number of other things, in regard to any matter that may be pending or that may by the law or under the Constitution be brought before him in his official capacity.

Mr. HOAR. A bribe.

Mr. BECK. No, sir; that is not the section under which bribery is punished. It reaches any service he may render for pay in matters that are or may come before Congress. I will turn in a moment to the section in regard to bribery. I supposed some one would suggest that I was reading from the statute punishing bribery. There is a distinct provision in regard to bribery. Perhaps I had better remove all dispute about that. Section 5500 deals with bribery.

SEC. 5500. Any member of either House of Congress who asks, accepts, or receives any money, or any promise, contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value, either before or after he has been qualified or has taken his seat as such member, with intent to have his vote or decision on any question, matter, cause, or proceeding which may be at any time pending in either House, or before any committee thereof, influenced thereby, shall be punished by a fine not more than three times the amount asked, accepted, or received, and by imprisonment not more than three years.

And section 5420 provides the same punishment in regard to any one who offers any member of Congress a bribe. Therefore I repeat that independent of all questions of bribery, section 1781 punishes with fine and imprisonment double the fine and imprisonment named in the bill I have had the honor to propose any member of either House who receives any money for his attention to, or service, independent altogether of his vote, in regard to any matter which may by law or under the Constitution be brought before him in his official capacity as such member of Congress, whether the action or proceeding was pending or not when he took the money. That provision of law is an insult to sensitive gentlemen far greater than any that can be imagined as growing out of the proposition I have made, which is simply that members of Congress shall not be attorneys for land-grant roads, and shall not come into either House with retainers or fees in their pockets from the managers of those roads with which we have to deal. They are allowed, so far as this bill is concerned, to act as attorneys or agents for all other roads, corporations, or individuals, or they may be employed in any other capacity except in the interests of those roads that are our creatures, subject to our legislation, and in regard to which so many important public interests are involved under their charters and the acts of Congress passed or pending in regard to them. Congress has never trusted to the honor of its individual members.

Section 1782 Revised Statutes assumes that members of Congress may do things that they ought not to do and that public policy dictates they ought not to be allowed to do. The Senator from Connecticut seems to think it is an insult to have any prohibitory law upon the statute-book unless we first prove that some great wrong has been done. He argues that it is a reflection on somebody. The statute-books are full of such reflections, if gentlemen will examine them.

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me to make a single correction right there. The word "insult" was not in my remarks anywhere.

Mr. BECK. Well, the intimation was that the proposed law is a reflection upon gentlemen; that it ought to be presumed they would not be guilty of any improper conduct. The Revised Statutes are full of such reflections, and wholly disregard all such chivalrous sentiments. The very next section assumes that members of Congress may be guilty of improper conduct, because it provides:

SEC. 1782. No Senator, Representative, or Delegate, after his election and during his continuance in office, and no head of a Department, or other officer or clerk in the employ of the Government, shall receive or agree to receive any compensation whatever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered, or to be rendered, to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party, or directly or indirectly interested, before any Department, court-martial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever. Every person offending against this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be imprisoned not more than two years, and be fined not more than $10,000, and shall, moreover, by conviction therefor, be rendered forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.

I propose no such penalty as that, and yet a man may receive a fee, may have a retainer of a thousand or ten thousand dollars in his pocket from a land-grant railroad company to act as their attorney and stand by them under all the obligations that that retainer imposes upon him, and it is assumed to be very unjust to prevent him from occupying the relation of attorney and judge at the same time, yet if he takes one penny for helping any poor fellow to get an office he is liable to be fined not less than $2,000 and imprisoned four years, and be forever incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. All such complaints against the bill I introduced, and which the Senate, acting under the promptings of justice and decency, passed by such a pronounced majority, are, as I said at first, absolutely absurd in the face of such legislation as I have called attention to.

A member of Congress is not allowed to prosecute any claim either in the Court of Claims or before any Department of this Government. He can not for a consideration help the humblest or the most deserving of his own constituents; he can not receive a penny for it, no matter how much labor he may perform, or however much he may be convinced of the justice of the claim. The law does not allow him to do it. Even a clerk who has served in any Department is not allowed to practice before the Court of Claims or in any Department of the Government, no matter how needy or dependent he may be, and however well qualified he may be, for two years after he leaves the employ of the United States; if he does he is guilty of a misdemeanor. And yet I am to be told that because I insist and the Senate has voted that attorneys for land-grant railroads shall not sit in either House of Congress to be influenced by the money received from those corporations I am insulting or wounding the sensibilities of somebody!

The Revised Statutes go a great deal further than my bill goes. Senators will observe that this bill only carries out a well-established, just public policy. Here is another provision, section 3739 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 3739. No member of or Delegate to Congress shall directly or indirectly, himself, or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertake, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement made or entered into in behalf of the United States, by any officer or person authorized to make contracts on behalf of the United States. Every person who violates this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined $3,000.

The Senator from Connecticut wondered if we thought anybody was guilty of being an attorney for land-grant railroads. Would anybody suppose that a member of either House of Congress would be interested in Government contracts? The Congress of the United States seemed to think that possible, and therefore provided against it, and provided a fine of $3,000 for those guilty of it. It goes on to provide:

All contracts or agreements made in violation of this section shall be void; and whenever any sum of money is advanced on the part of the United States, in consideration of any such contract or agreement, it shall be forthwith repaid; and in case of refusal or delay to repay the same, when demanded, by the proper officer of the Department under whose authority such contract or agreement shall have been made or entered into, every person so refusing or delaying, together with his surety or sureties, shall be forthwith prosecuted at law for the recovery of any such sum of money so advanced.

Section 3741, according to the ideas of the Senator from Connecticut, places upon the statute-book a direct reflection upon every member of either House of Congress. It uses this language:

SEC. 3741. In every such contract or agreement to be made or entered into, or accepted by or on behalf of the United States, there shall be inserted an express condition that no member of Congress shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract or agreement, or to any benefit to arise thereupon.

He has to be reflected upon or insulted in the face of every contract made by the United States by the insertion of an express provision to the effect that he must be excluded. Is it to be regarded as no insult that the law says members of Congress shall not have any connection with that class of business; and that it is an attack on the character of a member of Congress to say that he shall not be attorney for land-grant roads while he is drawing a salary from the United States as a member of either House?

I might go on and read provision after provision far more searching, more insulting, if that word may be used, than the provisions of the bill which is now sought to be reconsidered. It is called my bill. I accept it. I limit the prohibition, as Senators know, to the railroads that have been chartered by the United States or that have received land grants or subsidies from the United States, because these roads are our creatures, subject to the control of Congress, at least that is the theory, and we have to deal with them in a great variety of ways. I insist that no right-thinking man would claim that they ought to have their hired attorneys voting on this floor, where questions affecting them may arise at any moment. Here is one provision, for example:

SEC. 4001. All railway companies to which the United States have furnished aid by grant of lands, right of way, or otherwise, shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and, until such price is fixed by law, the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

Ought any attorney of any of these railroads to vote in Congress upon that question, which involves millions of dollars to the tax-payers or the railroads, according to the way it may be adjusted by law. We have had it up time and again. We have the absolute right to fix any rate we please for carrying the mails. Surely every member of Congress ought to be free to act in the interest of the United States, and he ought not to be the retained attorney of any of the railroads with whom we are settling important matters of that sort. No member of Congress can make any contract of any kind with the United States; he can not even agree in advance, as section 1781 provides, to attend to any business for any person that may come before Congress. Here is a provision saying that all the mails of the United States over these land-grant roads must be adjusted by the representatives of the people.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator pardon a question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. It happened that I was absent from the city last week when this bill was under consideration, and I therefore labor under the misfortune of not having heard the debate.

Mr. BECK. There was no debate.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator to advise me, as I presume that he had some object in presenting this bill, that it is not mere fulmination, mere target-practice or firing in the air, if he knows or has any reason to believe that there is any member of this or the other House who is or has been acting as attorney for any of these land-grant roads; and then if he will pardon me one question further, I should like to ask him why this provision, if it is a valid and proper one, should not apply to all railroad corporations as well as to land-grant railroads of the United States?

Mr. BECK. If I had ever so much information in regard to the action of individuals it would not bear upon this question, and giving it might only bring up a personal wrangle of denial and assertion in regard to members of Congress having relations with these roads. If it is against public policy, as I think it is, that any man should, while attorney for a land-grant road, be a member of either House of Congress, that is a good reason for the passage of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the exigency that requires this bill without a reference to be passed instantaneously, extemporaneously, without consideration or report by a committee? I assume that the Senator must have some information, or else he would permit this bill to take the ordinary course of legislation. I submit that when he asks us to depart from the usual custom of the Senate in these matters, if he has information he ought to communicate it so that we may act upon the same information that he does.

Mr. BECK. It is not my method of dealing with legislation to indulge in personal wrangles. I am making no charges.

Mr. INGALLS. It is a question not of personal wrangle but of information.

Mr. BECK. I am making no charges against anybody. If I were to say there are or have been members of either House engaged in this way, then I should be called on to name them, and then to have an investigation. I do not name any one. I am asserting that if there is any principle that ought to govern the action of a member of Congress, it ought to be that he should not be the attorney for a land-grant railroad over which we have jurisdiction and with which we are compelled to have conflicts here and in the courts upon questions of great public importance, involving vast sums of money and important principles of public policy; and if any man has such a connection he ought to surrender it before he comes to Congress, and he ought to act the part of a judge, guarding the interests of the people of the United States, and allow the railroads to have other attorneys who bear no official relation to the public interest.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I interrupt for a moment?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator goes further in the bill, which says, "which obtained its charter or any grant of land or pecuniary aid from the United States," no matter whether it was five, twenty, or forty years ago, and no matter how completely closed the transaction may have been, how completely it may have passed from the memory of man, how utterly disconnected with Congress it may have been.

Mr. INGALLS. Take the case of the Illinois Central, for instance.

Mr. HAWLEY. I spoke of that before.

Mr. BECK. I read the statute providing that every railroad company to which the United States has furnished grants of land, right of way, or other aid shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress shall by law prescribe. I do not care whether the road was finished twenty years ago or ten years ago, if it is a land-grant railroad we have a right to require it to carry our mails free of charge if Congress so declares; and we have a right to settle that question without having any paid attorney of that road in either body; and I insist that no man has a right to be attorney for any railroad company over which we have such power and hold such obligation when he assumes the duty of a Senator or Representative in Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question simply for information?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. I inquire whether in the case of those earlier grants of lands to the States that were afterward given by the States to particular railroad companies, as in the case of the Illinois Central, the provision of the statute he has read as to carrying the mails applies to such roads? I ask for information, because I do not know.

Mr. BECK. I have not the statutes before me, and without the charters of these roads I can not state accurately what the mail provision applies to; but I assert that it is demanded by public policy when any gentleman accepts the position of Senator or Representative in the other House, that he ought to dissolve his connection with all the land-grant railroads of the United States. There are plenty of lawyers who can attend to that business, when he is by virtue of his position professing to be the disinterested representative of the States and people. His duty is to guard them, and not to look to the interest of railroads with their money in his pocket.

I go a step farther. I think it is improper that any lawyer who has a retainer or a fee in any form from any land-grant railroad should vote or should go into the courts of the United States to argue questions as their retained counsel. Men may be employed by these railroad companies simply because they are members of Congress, simply because of the influence they are supposed by their clients to have over the judges who were perhaps nominated by them or who were confirmed by the votes of such members of Congress as are Senators. The clients know that those judges are looking every day to the Senate for favors and think that they grant favors in return.

I have before me now a bill that passed the Senate the other day, for which, no doubt, the judges of the Supreme Court are very much obliged to the Senate of the United States and would look very kindly on any suggestion that would come from that direction:

It reads as follows:

A bill to authorize the employment of law clerks or stenographers for the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of facilitating the dispatch of business in the Supreme Court of the United States, said court be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a law clerk for the Chief-Justice and one for each of the associate justices thereof, with an annual salary, to be fixed by the court, not to exceed the sum of $2,000, to be paid monthly out of any moneys appropriated for the expenses of that court: Provided, That each person so employed shall be subject to removal at the pleasure of the court or at the pleasure of the member of the court to whom he is assigned for duty.

I think litigants who have business before that court often seek to obtain the services of some member of Congress who has obliged the judges, say, by giving them each a two-thousand-dollar clerk for their accommodation, however needed it might be, and that the client would leave his home lawyer that he would otherwise perhaps have employed. While I do not seek in this bill to prevent members of either House of Congress from practicing in the Supreme or any other court and obtaining such benefits as they may obtain by reason of their position, they have enough advantage without having the additional advantage of having the fees of the land-grant or subsidized railroads in their pockets when they are dealing either with the courts or with Congress over all the other lawyers of the country, and they ought not to have it.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky if any Senator who has a private secretary votes anything more for a bill advocated by the Senators who voted that he should have such secretary.

Mr. BECK. I do not think that cuts any figure. I am insisting that it is against public policy for men who have to deal with these land-grant railroads, in their extensions, in their mails, in their obligations to us, to be their attorneys. I hold in my hand——

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senator has caught the point of my question.

Mr. BECK. I find no fault with gentlemen practicing in the courts; but I deny that the railroads to which we have granted charters should have representatives in either House of Congress as their attorneys. Unless prohibited they will seek them naturally because of advantages that their relations with the court give them. I repeat it is unjust to the other lawyers if there was no higher objection.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. I understood him to imply that the judges of the Supreme Court would be likely to favor or would be thought by clients to be likely to favor Senators who voted for the bill giving them law clerks.

Mr. BECK. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator seemed to put a pretty serious imputation upon the judges. My question was whether he thought that a Senator to whom we have given a private secretary would vote any more for the bills introduced by the men who voted for that measure.

Mr. BECK. I am not going into that. It is simply nibbling at a great question like this. I said that litigants in the country who saw the relations that existed between Senators and the court by reason of the favors that the court was receiving from Senators would look to them as clients always look to men that they think are in favor with the powers that be in the courts to decide, and that they had advantages enough over the other attorneys of the country by reason of that relation, which the clients would always understand, and which gave them a legitimate standing before the court, without the additional fees that they receive from railroads chartered by us and with which we have to deal. That is what I was insisting upon, and I insist upon it now.

It is a rule of the House of Representatives that no member has a right to vote on any measure in which he is personally interested. It ought to be the rule everywhere. I contended for it here three years ago in regard to national banks and their attorneys when Congress extended from six months to three years the time for payment of the notes that had been lost during the time the banks were in existence and which had to be paid to us when they went into liquidation or their charters expired. We had a reliable report that there were at least six millions of these notes lost. The banks were obliged by law to account for them within six months, yet Congress gave them three years, and the Comptroller last winter was seeking to get them absolutely. That extension at 6 per cent. interest was a gift of $900,000 given to the national banks, and the attorneys for the banks in both Houses of Congress voted for that $900,000 gift. But that is a small matter compared with the questions involved in the land-grant and subsidized railroads. Still it illustrates the power of great corporations and their attorneys in the legislation of the country.

I had another object in view when I prepared the bill. I insist that there ought to be no excuse for any crimination or recrimination such as we have heard in regard to the interest of Senators as attorneys for land-grant railroads; the law ought to make such a relation impossible. I can turn to the debate in this body not only this year but last year and the year before, where all sorts of intimations were thrown out that there are men in both Houses of Congress who are interested in the land-grant and in the subsidized roads and have been acting as attorneys for them. I desire to pass a law to make it impossible that that thing can be said in regard to any member of Congress without its being a personal affront. Pass a bill that he shall not so act, and then the presumption will be that every honorable man will refuse to act as their attorney, and that he will be in fact as in law the representative of the United States and of all the people of the United States in the controversies between the Government of the United States and the creatures that it created and in regard to the obligations that they have undertaken.

I was about to say when the Senator from Massachusetts interrupted me that I hold in my hand a House bill and a House report, a Senate bill and a Senate report, made to this Congress in regard to the Union and Central Pacific Railroads, where they are seeking to get relief from what is known as the Thurman act and where all sorts of appeals in the interests of these roads are made. One is a very able report from the Senator from Massachusetts himself [Mr. HOAR], another an amendment by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], another in the House of Representatives, all dealing with great questions in connection with these roads.

Will any gentleman in either House insist that any man who is the attorney of either road, any man who is retained in any way by any of these roads, when these great questions involving perhaps fifty or one hundred million dollars to the tax-burdened people of this country come up for consideration, shall, without letting us know it, advocate the interests of the road whose money, in the shape of retainers or fees, he has in his pocket, keeping the fact concealed, professing all the time that he is acting and arguing in the interest of the United States? I say it ought not to be allowed, and all I seek to do by this bill is to say that it shall not be.

Heretofore we have had, as common rumor asserts, arguments made by distinguished lawyers in both Houses apparently in the interest of the public service with thousands of dollars of the money of these railroads in their pockets when they were persuading us to take one side or the other side apparently only for the public good.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that the Senator from Kentucky be allowed to finish his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BECK. I am perfectly willing to stop now. I suppose we can bring the bill up to-morrow morning again, because other gentlemen desire to discuss it. I have been told by the Senator from Colorado that he desired to do so. To-morrow morning I can finish. I do not want to interrupt the regular order, but I do desire to have this motion disposed of as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the pre-emption-law repeal bill.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Before the regular order is taken up, I send to the desk an amendment, which I desire to have printed and inserted in the RECORD, to the bill which has been under discussion, which I shall offer if the motion to reconsider prevails.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, to the bill (S. 2578) to prohibit members of Congress from acting as attorneys or employés for railroad companies holding charters or having received grant of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States, namely: In line 7, after the words "United States," insert the following:

"Or from any bank or other corporation, or officer or agent thereof, which obtained its charter or any pecuniary aid from the United States; or from any corporation or company, its officer or agent, engaged in the business of interstate commerce, by land or water, or in the business of any interstate transportation, or in the transportation of United States mails; or from any corporation, company, firm, or person, or officer or agent thereof, engaged in the production, manufacture, or sale in the United States, or in the business of importing into the United States from any foreign country, any article whatsoever upon the importation of which any customs duty is now levied, or shall at any time hereafter be levied, by any act of Congress; or from any corporation, company, or person, its officer or agent, engaged in the manufacture, production, consumption, or sale of butter, oleomargarine, tobacco, whisky, or wines, or any other product or article whatsoever in any manner now taxable or subject to taxation by any act of Congress; or of any company, firm, corporation, or person, its officer or agent, engaged in raising milch-cows, or beef-cattle, or hogs, or in the manufacture or sale of butter, or of the oleo oil from which is manufactured oleomargarine."

Mr. CALL. If it be in order, I venture to express the hope that the unfinished business will be laid aside and that we proceed to the consideration of the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I think it an important matter, and one which ought to be fully considered by the Senate. I believe there are a number of Senators who wish to be heard on the subject. I do myself. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is in order. The Senator from Florida moves that the present bill be laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], being the bill (S. 2578) to prohibit members of Congress from acting as attorneys or employés for railroad companies holding charters or having received grants of lands or pecuniary aid from the United States.

Mr. PLATT. That displaces the pre-emption repeal bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think we ought to do that.

Mr. CALL. Can we not do it temporarily?

Mr. TELLER. No; let the regular order go on.

Mr. CALL. Let it be done informally. I move to lay it aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. DOLPH. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. CALL. Then I move to lay aside the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida renews his motion to lay aside the pending bill with a view to proceed to the consideration of the railroad bill.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair meaning by "railroad bill" the bill just under discussion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill in regard to acting as attorneys for certain railroads.

Mr. CALL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that the Senator who is in charge of this bill consented to the arrangement that it might go over for discussion to-morrow morning. Why should we waste time now and postpone the regular order which we have agreed on both sides should come up at 2 o'clock, and should be the regular order? This is the first business on the Calendar, and it is extremely important to get it to the House. It deals with a very great question, and it has been discussed largely for several days. Nothing will be saved by using the time in calling the yeas and nays and debating when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] himself agreed that this matter might go until to-morrow.

Mr. CALL. If Senators on the other side so desire I have no objection to withdrawing the motion; but the argument and discussion upon this bill in my impression is an impeachment of the Senate and of the members of Congress, and it ought to be disposed of. The Senate owes it to its own dignity, and every Senator here to his, that when the matter has been presented as it has it be fully considered. I do not think there is anything more important, and the country would feel that the Senate has a proper appreciation of its own dignity if it considers and acts on it.

Mr. HARRISON. I perfectly agree with the Senator about that. The only question is about disturbing an established order which has unanimous consent on both sides.

Mr. CALL. It will take a long time if we only devote the morning hour to this bill. But I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pre-emption repeal bill is before the Senate. Pending that, the Chair will dispose of morning business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1836) for the relief of Libbie C. Montis with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the following bills:

A bill (S. 2292) to provide for the settlement of a certain Cherokee claim under the treaty of February 14, 1833; and

A bill (H. R. 1341) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Natchez, Miss.

CANCELLATION OF LAND ENTRIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are a number of maps and other exhibits attached to the letter of the Secretary of the Interior submitted this morning in respect to suspension of entries in the Land Office. These will be referred to the Committee on Printing. To have them printed by a formal order would involve delay and expense.

Mr. VOORHEES. If an order should be made for printing that document——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The custom has been, where the accompanying papers and maps are likely to involve delay and large expense, that the question of printing is referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. VOORHEES. I know nothing about the maps, but the text ought to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter has already been ordered to be printed. It is only the question of printing the exhibits sent in by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well.

CHEROKEE CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. 2292) to provide for the settlement of a certain Cherokee claim under the treaty of February 14, 1833, returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. There was a clerical error in that bill as passed by the Senate. I ask unanimous consent now to make the correction by inserting the words "Old Settler" in line 4, and striking out the word "nation" and inserting "Indians" in line 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendments will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in line 4 of the bill, before the word "Cherokee," to insert "Old Settler," and to strike out the word "nation" in line 5 and insert "Indians;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the treasurer of the Old Settler Cherokee Indians the sum of $2,800, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the vote on the passage of the bill will be reconsidered, and also the vote on the third reading. The bill is now open to amendment, and the question is on the amendments of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL CEMETERY AT NATCHEZ.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 1341) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Natchez, Miss., returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. WALTHALL. I ask unanimous consent to make a correction in the amendment of the Senate to that bill, the error having occurred in the Senate. The correction is to strike out the word "and," between "macadamized" and "gravel," and insert "or." The amendment was passed "macadamized or gravel," but in making it up the clerk put in the wrong word.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the word "and" and insert "or;" so as to read:

That the sum of $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing a macadamized or gravel road from the city of Natchez, Miss., to the national cemetery near that city.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment heretofore made will be changed as proposed. The Chair hears no objection.

LIBBIE C. MONTIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1836) for the relief of Libbie C. Montis, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Libbie C. Montis, widow of Mahlon D. Montis, late a private in Company G, of the Second Regiment Ohio Volunteers, war with Mexico.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 118) for the relief of J. M. Hobbs was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 190) to loan the taxing district of Shelby County, Tennessee, certain barges, boats, &c., at Memphis, Tenn., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RICHARD C. RIDGWAY AND OTHERS.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask that Order of Business 333, being the bill (S. 1839) for the relief of Richard C. Ridgway and others, be placed on the Calendar under Rule VIII. During my absence from the Senate some days ago it was placed under Rule IX. I ask that it take its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. I do not wish to call it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the bill named by him be placed on the Calendar under Rule VIII instead of Rule IX. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7183) to authorize the purchase of a certain tract of land near San Antonio, Tex., agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the said bill and the amendments thereto, and had appointed Mr. CUTCHEON, Mr. LAIRD, and Mr. ERMENTROUT managers at the conference on its part.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 985) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La., to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at said place for educational purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the said bill and the amendments thereto, and had appointed Mr. WHEELER, Mr. DARGAN, and Mr. STEELE managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 4498) authorizing an additional appropriation of $25,000 for the court-house at Keokuk, Iowa, to make the same fire-proof; and

A bill (H. R. 7650) to remove the political disabilities of I. G. Flournoy, of Mississippi.

PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber-culture, the laws authorizing the sale of desert lands, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out from the proposed amendment the words "said lands shall ever" and insert "the public lands of the United States shall hereafter;" so that the amendment will read:

Provided further, That none of the public lands of the United States shall hereafter be sold or held in larger bodies than 640 acres in a single ownership (unless the title thereto be derived by inheritance), which, as an express condition, shall be inserted in the original patent thereof; and breach of the condition shall render the lands liable to forfeiture to the United States.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to raise a question whether the amendment to the amendment is in order. The proposition of the committee as it appears before the Senate is itself in the form of an amendment to the bill under consideration. To that amendment I moved an amendment. Is not the proposition of the Senator from Kansas an amendment in the third degree?

Mr. INGALLS. If the Chair will hear me a moment on that point——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no doubt about it. The amendment is in order.

Mr. INGALLS. The motion to strike out and insert renders the part proposed to be stricken out and the part proposed to be inserted both open to amendment in the second degree.

Mr. BLAIR. I merely wished to ascertain where we are, because it would make a little difference in the remarks I propose to offer to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, for myself I believe in the principle embodied in the proposed amendment of the honorable Senator from Kansas. There is a bill now pending before the Committee on Public Lands which embodies precisely that principle, and involves, if it should become a law, its application to all the agricultural public lands of the United States. The committee has considered that bill to some extent, but not decisively, and has not as yet ordered it to be reported. I am not able to say what will become of it in the committee, but I believe that in due time it will reach the Senate with the approval of the committee.

But this bill does not contemplate a general discussion of the principle thus involved. The main purpose of the bill is to abolish three of the forms under which the public lands may now be acquired by private individuals, and to substitute in place of them acquisition by what is called the process of home exemption. It abolishes the timber-culture act in toto, and it abolishes all other methods of acquisition, as I have stated, save only the plan by homestead exemption and the method of acquisition under the desert-land act.

The original proposition was to abolish this latter method of acquisition also, but it has been thought necessary, as so large a proportion of the public domain is desert land, that there should be some special provision retained, analogous to the old provisions of the desert-land act, under which this great part of the public domain may be reclaimed, made habitable, suitable for homesteads and for the exercise of that producing power which is essential to the multiplication of our people.

Therefore, it is only necessary to consider the question involved in this amendment at the present time so far as the features of the desert-land act which we propose to retain are concerned. It is found that in order that these lands may be reclaimed at all two things must be done. First, a system of irrigation must be provided. That involves vast expenditure. Systems of irrigation have been established in the Territories and in some of the Western States under the local laws. They are not the creature of the laws of the United States at all. Large companies have been organized, vast amounts of capital have been concentrated in those companies, and by virtue of the development of the power of irrigation they will come ultimately of necessity to control all the land that is thus to be made serviceable to man. The power that owns the water which supplies these vast areas is the power which controls the land; and if the irrigating companies are allowed to go on under State organization and buy and control all the water which irrigates 10 square miles, 60 square miles, 100 square miles, or 500 square miles, in no way under the control of and in no wise responsible to the national authorities, they will come ultimately, of course, to control the desert lands. If they are permitted to do this, unless before we part originally with the title now vested in the Government to these lands we impose some condition which shall make them available to the poorer classes of our people, available to the middling population of the present and the future, the result must be that the control and management of vast sections, equivalent in area to some of the older States, will fall into the hands of very few individuals.

So it is that right here and now in the enactment or defeat of this measure (and if it is to be enacted by the adoption of some such provision as is suggested in the amendment) we have to decide the question for all time whether individuals, men of small property, are to control these grounds under any such reasonable terms as will permit their existence, or whether we are to turn over the control to vast syndicates, to great corporations, and to land monopolists.

I do not know that the amendment which has been proposed is in the best form, but I do know that we stand now at the parting of the ways, and that the decision which we make at this time with reference to this matter, if the bill is to become a law, is decisive for all time. It is not important with reference to the present moment; it is not important with reference to the reclamation and the immediate uses of this land; but it is important with reference to that time when land will become a scarcity in this country, when instead of a population of 60,000,000 people we shall have a population of 300,000,000, and when it will become a serious question whether the individual citizen in the United States shall be satisfied with the seven acres, which under the institutions of old Rome were given to a citizen, or whether he shall be deprived wholly of that independence which is the result of the ownership of land.

We sanction the principle in this initiatory legislation as in all our legislation with reference to public land. that we give a homestead of only 160 acres. We do not permit any individual to acquire more than that amount under the homstead law, under the pre-emption law, or under the timber-culture law. We restrict the holdings; and under the desert-land act we restrict the holdings which shall be derived by the original acquisition of title as it passes from the General Government, from the sovereignty in which resides the original title for all these lands. We recognize the principle here and now in this initial act; and yet if there be reason for the adoption of the principle at any time, if there be reason for the adoption of the principle now, that reason will be increased an hundred fold in the future.

Of what comparative importance, I ask, is it whether now in the reclamation of these lands before they are valuable to anybody we restrict the holding? If after these lands have become productive in the future we could see to it that for the benefit of the individual citizen who may depend upon land for his sustenance there should be the necessary subdivisions, it would be well; but when we have once parted with our title, when it has become a vested right in private ownership, how then are we to remedy and to avoid the evil which will become flagrant and which at the present time exists only in anticipation?

To my mind, there would be no harm whatever in permitting capital in vast quantities and in small ownerships to be invested not only in the irrigating company itself but in the process of the reclamation of these lands. That would do no harm at the present time. It might facilitate the opening of the country to settlement by making the land valuable. But the difficulty is that when we have parted with the title our control over the land is gone under the principles of law and the adjudications of the courts, and in the future, unless it be by revolution, unless it be, so to speak, by lawless interference with the law itself, there is no way in which we can remove the evil which will be the result of allowing these lands once to pass into private ownership in vast quantities.

Therefore it is that it becomes all important that now we put some limitation upon the amount of land that shall be holden. The bill itself undertakes to do that, so far as parting with the title from the General Government is concerned; but if we may impose a condition as to the amount that shall originally be parted with, can we not also impose a condition as to the size of the ownership in all time to come? Can we not impose a limitation which shall run with the land? Have not nations done it in all times past? Has it not been necessary? Was it not necessary under the institutions of old Rome while she was yet a republic? Has it not been done by various other nations? If it has been, it demonstrates not only the necessity but the possibility of its being done, and being so done as to contribute to the stability, to the permanency, and to the prosperity of the people.

I have already alluded to the fact that the real necessity increases as time goes on, as the lands are improved, and as population is multiplied; and yet I have called attention to the fact that unless we act now we can never act. It is an evil which must be prevented by the action of the national power at the present time, or it is never likely to be prevented at all.

Whether the holding of land in vast quantities be a public evil, is a question which has been suggested here. It is claimed that under the operation of our institutions there should be no restriction whatever upon the acquisition of vast quantities of land, because it is said that under the operation of our institutions these vast quantities will become redistributed; but if they are liable to be acquired at all, what reply is it to the existence of the evil to say that masses of land to-day may be acquired and subsequently be subdivided under the natural operation of the laws of society and of our institutions, if a like acquisition could go on with reference to other lands under the Government in other places, and the evil simply be transferred from one locality to another? The fact that this process goes on at all anywhere in our country demonstrates the fact that if it proceeds under the operation of the laws of human nature, the same acquisition will continue in other portions of the country. It is an evil which will grow with its own aggravation, once existing at all. The demoralization which will result will be likely to contribute to the aggregation of the evil, until finally our institutions will fall as the institutions of other nations have fallen, by reason of the acquisition and control of the public lands in the hands of a few individuals.

This evil has already shown itself in our own country. What is the difficulty with the South to-day? More than all things else the development of our southern country is prevented by the fact that its land ownership is in large masses and that the common people are in a situation where they are unable to acquire the consideration wherewith they may purchase land, which is cheap, largely for the very reason that it is held in such enormous ownerships, and that resulting from a condition of things which has passed away, you will say, but nevertheless the land in the South, what ought to be the most prosperous, as it is the most fertile region of our country; the great evil growing out of slavery exists in its consequences to-day; and that is likely to prevail until such time as there shall be acquired from some source or other a sufficiency of capital on the part of the common people of the country, there to obtain possession of and to depend upon a living derived from the land. For there is nothing so true in my mind as that land and liberty are just the same thing. They are synonymous terms.

There is a wide and a recognized distinction between property in land and property of a personal nature. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], in his remarks yesterday in support of his amendment, claimed that all property is the same in nature, and that an effort to restrict the holding of land is precisely the same as though it were an effort to restrict the amount of personal property which should be held by individuals. But, sir, it is not the case at all. Land has in itself when combined with labor a creative power which does not belong to personal property. That is evanescent in form, in substance; it is of no importance except as it may be made use of in connection with labor for the improvement of the creative power of the land itself. So the man who has his 40 acres of land, or his 20 acres of land, can root himself and his family in the soil and grow by virtue of it, when any amount of property, unless it may be converted by purchase into that which the land produces, would soon result only in his starvation and in his ruin.

As to whether this evil does exist in our country, and if so to what extent, I have alluded to the South already. The bonanza farms, as they are called, that is to say the farms of a thousand acres or more, have increased many hundred per cent. during the last decade, between 1870 and 1880. There is one single ownership of land in the State of Florida of 4,000,000 acres, owned by a citizen of Philadelphia to-day. There is many a farm in this country to-day of from 50,000 to 60,000 acres of land. What is the great curse of California to-day? Her Mexican land grants and the ownership of the improved and valuable agricultural lands of that State being vested in comparatively few individuals. The difficulty with the Pacific coast more than any other difficulty that can be named is the ownership of vast masses of land in the hands of comparatively few individvals. The same is true in Arizona; the same is true in New Mexico; and the same is becoming true, and by virtue of the operations of this measure will become irremediably true in all our Western States and Territories where desert lands abound, and they comprise, as has been shown already, at least five-sevenths of the available public domain of the present day.

This amendment is aimed at the restriction, or rather at the prevention of the existence of this evil. I do not know whether it be the best remedy that could be devised. No other has been offered in this direction. As the discussion has gone on I have noted the objections which have been raised, and I have endeavored by modifications of my amendment, which I will now read to the Senate, to remove all those objections. Undoubtedly further objections would arise in the operation of such a law. Experience will develop them. It can only be expected that at the present time we adopt some provision sufficiently broad and comprehensive to prevent the introduction of the evil, and then having prevented the introduction of the evil if there be hardships in the operation of the provision we can relieve or modify them from time to time in the future. Under the operation of the desert-land act as proposed, no title can be acquired for three or four years at the least, and as I said, long before acquisition of the title will take place to a single section under its provisions there will be ample opportunity to relieve from any hardship that may result from a lack of sufficiently liberal legislation at the present time.

One objection made to my amendment was that the seller of the land might own tracts in different parts of the country. If he did, the land that is affected by the operation of this measure would be subject to forfeiture in his own hands; but the difficulty is suggested that by reason of his ownership of lands where the forfeiture had not been enforced, lands situated in different parts of the country, he might be able to impose upon the purchaser, and thus obtain a consideration for lands which he had no right to sell, and the purchaser would be defrauded. In order to avoid that difficulty, which in practice I believe would not be of serious consequence, I desire that the amendment may be still further modified, after the words in the sixth line, "single ownership," by the insertion of the words "within the same county." All land transactions or transfers of title are recorded, of course, in the county where they take place, and become matters of record; so that if the amendment be modified in that way it will read:

That none of said lands shall ever be sold or held in larger bodies than 640 acres in a single ownership within the same county.

The evil will thus be obviated of imposition by men who may own land in various parts of the country selling their lands thus owned in violation of law to purchasers who might pay for them in ignorance of the fact that their title was subject to forfeiture.

Another objection suggested was that the act of forfeiture might be committed years and years before the enforcement of the forfeiture, and thus difficulty would occur. In order to reach that suggested difficulty, I wish to modify the amendment by adding to it the words:

Proceedings for which forfeiture shall be waived unless commenced within ten years after the act of forfeiture is committed.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] raises still another objection, an objection which I do not believe would have force, and yet it is well enough to provide against it. He says that after the lands have passed under the control of the State governments it would be anomalous, to say the least, if not a violation of the rights of ownership of the States, for the General Government, which originally imposes these conditions, to assume jurisdiction over any act of forfeiture. That may be so, or it may not be so. It is not necessary to raise the ghost of State-rights in order that we may have the amendment efficient; and therefore I desire to modify it still further to meet his objection by adding these words:

But if the act of forfeiture shall occur within the jurisdiction of a State, such proceedings shall be within the exclusive jurisdiction of such State.

If there be no objection, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be modified in the manner which I have indicated. If no member of the committee and no other Senator makes an objection, I ask that this be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner suggested by him. If there be no objection he will be allowed to so modify it. The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have the amendment read as it has been modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified by the mover.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 48 of section 3 it is proposed to add the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That none of said lands shall ever be sold or held in larger bodies than 640 acres in a single ownership within the same county (unless the title thereto be derived by inheritance), which, as an express condition, shall be inserted in the original patent thereof; and breach of the condition shall render the lands liable to forfeiture to the United States, proceedings for which forfeiture shall be waived unless commenced within ten years after the act of forfeiture is committed. But if the act of forfeiture shall occur within the jurisdiction of a State, such proceedings shall be within the exclusive jurisdiction of such State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is so modified.

Mr. PLATT. That does not interfere with the pending amendment of the Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire as modified.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in his remarks yesterday introduced, as a reply to the objections raised to the acquisition of large masses of land in the hands of individuals or corporations, the census; and he claims that because the census shows that the ownership of small farms in the country is very rapidly increasing, therefore the alleged evil of the acquisition of great tracts of land in single ownerships does not exist in our country, at least to such an extent as to be a great or a threatened evil. I think any one must see that there is no connection between the Senator's argument and the Senator's conclusion. Any one who considers that we have a continent of our own, and that the lands of the United States to-day are as large in area as those of all Europe, and who considers further that we have a population of not more than one-sixth that of the continent I have last named, will see at once that there is room for a very vast and rapid expansion of the holdings of land which will not in the slightest degree interfere with the progress of the evil of which we complain and against which we seek to guard by this amendment.

It is a matter of common information that vast acquisitions of tracts of land in all the valuable and available portions of this country, in the Territories and the States alike, have been going on during recent years in the form of alien ownership in West Virginia, in Texas, and in all the Territories. It is not necessary to specify them, because, as I said before, it is a matter of common information that the evil everywhere exists. The committee of which my honorable friend is a member at this very session reported a bill—I had almost said under his very direction, certainly under his direction and that of the chairman of the committee, and he was as active as anybody in securing the enactment of a bill to prohibit acquisition to go on any longer under alien ownership. But that will have but a very slight effect to prevent the investment of foreign capital and the substantial control of these vast bodies of land in the hands practically of foreign individuals. Wherever the capital is there income will be found, and our country will come to be drained by the foreign landholders as it is to-day being drained by the foreign bondholders. It will come to be drained of the income of our real estate.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator a single question. Does he think that the bonds of the United States are now held by foreigners to any considerable extent?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not think they are held to any considerable extent now. The time was when they were so held, and I only speak of that as an illustration of the fact that that people must rapidly become poor which pays largely in the way of interest on the income of its lands to a foreign people or to foreign capitalists, and it is wise for us to initiate and to establish the policy in reference to our lands which we have substantially recovered with reference to our bonds.

But the point I was making is that by prohibiting the ownership of lands in the name of aliens we do not reach the root of the evil. It is the fact of the investment of the foreign capital. That we can not reach perhaps fully, but the real evil grows out of the fact of the ownership of the land in vast bodies subject to the dictation and control of a comparatively few individuals. That proceeding is going on in this country, that evil is flagrant in all sections of our country, and if we would remove it and guard ourselves against the evils of foreign landlordism, or domestic landlordism, if you please, it is necessary for us now to secure, if possible, some provision by which the vast tracts we are seeking to reclaim shall be held in comparatively small subdivisions.

I wish to read the testimony of Mr. William Godwin Moody, a somewhat distinguished political economist of our country, a man who has given as much study possibly to the subject of the land-holdings of the country as any other one who lives in it. He was the first one to urge the establishment years ago of a national bureau of labor. He memorialized the last Congress, and he secured the memorializing of Congress by many distinguished men of the country; he pressed the measure, and finally it attracted public attention and others assisted, and the existence of the Labor Bureau is largely to be attributed to the movements which he initiated. He testified before the Senate committee in the year 1883 upon the relations between labor and capital, and speaking of the bonanza-farms in the country, with reference to which he had made personal investigations, having traveled some ten thousand miles, visiting them in person and examining their operations with a great deal of care, he said in reply to the question:

Q. Where do you locate that condition of things?

A. I will take the whole line from British Columbia down to the Mexican line, the region lying west of the Mississippi. Four years ago I visited that western region for the purpose of making an examination of these very features of its settlement. I made a trip of over 10,000 miles, and examined various farms running from 10,000 up to 100,000 acres, upon which there were thousands of acres in grain, where there were ten, one hundred, two hundred, or two hundred and fifty laborers employed, but not a woman or child or fixed inhabitant upon the territory of one of them.

Q. All males?

A. All males. For a period running from three to five months in the year, that is, from October to March, there would be only from three to five men employed on each one of those holdings, but there would be perhaps two hundred and fifty employed for two or three or four weeks, generally about three weeks, during harvest-time.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I do not quite understand your statement. You are speaking of the number employed during the winter months upon those farms as compared with the number employed during the harvest, are you not?

A. I am taking the two extremes of the labor employed upon those places. The lowest, I say, was from 3 to 5 persons employed on each of these great holdings in the winter months, from October to March (I am speaking without reference to my memoranda), and the largest number employed upon the largest farm which I visited was, I think, 250 men, who were employed during the harvest season in August and September. I was informed that in the time of plowing there would be from 25 to 50 men employed; in the seed-time perhaps a little larger number; in June and July, a much larger number. I speak now of the Grandin farm, in the valley of the Red River of the North, some 36 miles north of Fargo, in Dakota, along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad. Upon that place at the time I visited it there were a little more than 5,000 acres in wheat. The hands employed were: from April 1 to April 30, 150; from May 1 to July 15, 20; but if breaking new ground, 50; from July 15 to July 31, 100; from August 1 to September 15, 250; from September 15 to October 31, 75; from November 1 to March 31, I have the number set down here as 10. These are the numbers that were reported to me by the book-keeper; but, by inquiring of the men and from other sources, I learned they had but 5 men really during this last period, though evidently 10 appeared in the accounts. So you will see that from August 1 to September 15, a period of about six weeks, there were 250 men employed upon that farm as against 5 men during a period of five months, there being no woman or child or fixed inhabitant upon the place.

Of course the result of a system of that kind is that the lands of the country fall into the hands of what are called bonanza owners and are cultivated by men who receive wages and employment for a brief period, and who disappear during the remainder of the season and are of no consequence whatever as a local population. He is questioned in this way:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. To what extent do you find that method of holding land in large tracts by capitalists existing here, and is it increasing?

A. I will give you an approximation. Previous to 1860 the number of farms of 1,000 acres and over in the United States—that is, in the Northern States——

Mr. GEORGE [interposing]. Do you mean the Northwestern States as well?

A. I mean California, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Nebraska, Utah, Washington Territory, Wisconsin, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts—New England, the Middle States, and Ohio. In 1870, in the first tier of States, including Ohio and west of Ohio, the number was 1,236; in 1880 the number was 606. There was an increase of 100 per cent. in that decade, and I find that in the decade between 1870 and 1880 there has been an increase of 800 per cent. in the number of farms of that character.

Q. In the same territory?
